Lafcadio Hearn

LAFCADIO HEARN

[1850—1904]

CHARLES W. KENT

BROTHER in impressionistic prose to Pierre Loti-producing a style instinct with sensation, color and melody—Lafcadio Hearn first saw the light of day on the Island of Santa Maura, off the eastern coast of Greece, June 27, 1850. Anciently the deeply wooded, mountainous Ionian Isle had been called Leucadia (in modern Greek Levkas or Lefcada), and hence the name given the gifted son of Rose Cerigote, a beautiful Greek girl, and Surgeon-major Charles Bush Hearn, of the Seventy-sixth Foot, who were married according to Greek rites in Santa Maura. Here, where Sappho is reputed to have flung herself to death from the "rock of woe," little Lafcadio spent his earliest years, until England ceded the Ionian Isle to Greece, which necessitated the return of Dr. Hearn and his family to Dublin, Ireland. Afterwards, in his "Dream of a Summer Day," Hearn recalled that faraway birthplace of tragedies and romance: "I have memory of a place and a magical time, in which the sun and the moon were larger and brighter than now. Whether it was of this life or of some life before I cannot tell, but I know the sky was very much more blue and nearer the world. . . . The sea was alive and used to talk and the wind made me cry out for joy when it touched me."

Though Irish skies and scenes had suited the Hearns for three generations—the original head of the family having passed over from Dorsetshire to Meath in 1693 as private chaplain to a Lord Lieutenant—they offered a cheerless setting to the sun-loving Greek girl. Misunderstanding and unhappiness followed apace, and when Lafcadio was in his seventeenth year, with a brother three years his junior, the miserable mother fled to Smyrna, leaving her darkeyed, odd-looking children to the care of their indifferent father. The marriage was annulled and in time both parents contracted other nuptial ties. From this sensational break the sensitive elder son never recovered, and it probably sowed the seeds of that morbid distrust of closest friends, which became a fixed trait in his mature character.

Lafcadio, a passionate, sickly boy, was adopted by his grand-aunt, Mrs. Brenans, the widow of a wealthy Irishman, and taken to live in Wales, where he passed a strange childhood. Mrs. Brenans was a convert to the Roman Catholic Church and was extremely bigoted, being surrounded by fawning priests and converted protégés. One of these, however, known as "Cousin Jane," bequeathed him a number of classics and very soon he began to delight in mythology. His pious protectress, realizing his extraordinary devotion to "pagan gods," had him put under religious tutelage. Catechism and confession took the place of his beloved deities, and from even that early period he cherished his resentment against Romanism.

Little is known of his life between seven and nineteen, but the glimpses caught suffice to prove it an area of almost unrelieved dissatisfaction and wretchedness. Two years are supposed to have been spent in a Jesuit College in the northern part of France, which would account for his intimate and unusual knowledge of the French language. Certain it is that he was near Durham, where his student days evidently ended 1865, in all probability due to the distressing accident there which ruined the sight of one eye and impaired that of the other. A knot at the end of a rope used in a boyish game caused the dire misfortune, which thereafter was a source of perpetual distress to him. About the same time he became estranged from his grand-aunt and their connection was severed for good and all. Doubtless her crowd of parasites helped the cause along; for when she died, a few years later, they had sucked dry her substance, and little remained of her estate.

These were dark days for Lafcadio Hearn, tramping through the endless London streets, ill and half-blind. Details are happily lost, but it is stated in a letter of his that he was penniless, friendless, and sick in the great metropolis. Once he took service as a servant and once he was an inmate of the workhouse! Fragments of autobiographic papers, found after his death, shed these bits of crepuscular light upon his clouded early career.

Some time in 1869—the exact date remains obscure—he came to the new world to seek betterment. How he managed the trip is also unrecorded; but he arrived in New York City, and for almost two years wandered hither and thither with nothing to recommend him to an employer. Odd jobs fell in his way, however, and while buffeting the blows of fate he made a friend in an Irish carpenter, a fellow-exile, who allowed him to sleep on the shavings, together with other privileges. In return Lafcadio ran errands and performed some simple bookkeeping. But these pursuits, together with hours spent in public libraries, could not continue forever. Unrest urged him farther west, and at the end of two years he journeyed on an emigrant train to Cincinnati, Ohio, where indulging in mean employments, among which was that of assistant to a Syrian street peddler, he secured regular work as type-setter and proof-reader with the Robert Clark Company. While here he endeavored to introduce a punctuation reform which gained him among his fellows the soubriquet of "Old Semicolon."

Mechanical labor could not long satisfy his artistic nature, and he gave up his position with the publishers to become the private secretary of Thomas Vickers, then a librarian of the Cincinnati public library. Here his insatiable appetite for erudite matters was somewhat appeased, and he made the most of the opportunity; but early in 1874 he was engaged as a general reporter on the Cincinnati Enquirer. Forthwith market reports and kindred things were ground out until a chance opened a more congenial field to him in an assignment on an atrocious murder, which he wrote up with such gruesome power that the town experienced a nine days' thrill of horror. Colonel John A. Cockerill, then in charge of the Enquirer, was not slow to see the advantage of making Hearn a descriptive and sensational writer on his paper. That year of 1874 also found the young journalist combining forces with H. F. Farney, the artist, on an amorphous Sunday publication called Ge Giglampz, which met an early and well-earned death within nine weeks. During the following year he resigned from the Enquirer and went on the Gazette, but in 1876 became a regular reporter for the Commercial. Foremost among the friends he made in Cincinnati at this time were Joseph Timison and H. E. Krehbiel, the latter well-known musical critic becoming his favorite companion in many curious explorations of the polyglot slums in search for "material," particularly that which was strange and exotic.

Outside of this journalistic wear and tear he devoted his time to the study of the French Romantic school, and their passion for le mot juste became his. Hours stolen from sleep would be given to the transliteration of Theophile Gautier, whose works, replete with the fantastic and bizarre, were his daily diet. Poor eyesight could not deter his purpose, no more than a poor purse could prevent the buying of dictionaries and thesauri. And it will be remembered that his maiden volume contained inimitable translations of six tales by Gautier, under the general title of 'One of Cleopatra's Nights' (1882).

Cincinnati eventually wearied him, and Southern scenes powerfully appealing to his senses, as they had ever done, he went to New Orleans in the year 1877. Poverty and self-sacrifice again awaited him, but it was during his sojourn in Louisiana that he developed into one of the great literary stylists of the Nineteenth Century. At first he read proof, clipped exchanges and wrote editorials for a minor journal called the Daily Item. Occasionally he contributed a translation, usually something weird or wonderful, and again he would fashion the original story or essay which subsequently were known as his "fantastics." Despite carpet-bagger misrule and an epidemic of yellow fever which greeted him in the new environment, he enjoyed living among the people of New Orleans; the half-tropical life of the town had a peculiar appeal for him. Always anxious to free himself from the drudgery of daily journalism, he exercised economy, putting his small savings into several literary schemes, but all such ventures were failures and he came out of them poorer than ever. Chief among his fond dreams was that of opening a second-hand bookshop, but it never became a reality.

Instead, in 1881, by good fortune he was brought into contact with the personnel of the reorganized Times-Democrat, upon which he was given employment. The staff included such unusual men as Charles Whitney, Honoré Burthe, and John Augustin, while Page M. Baker was editor-in-chief. Amid these choice spirits Lafcadio Hearn found true appreciation of his genius, and thus encouraged he produced his unique translations from the French writers Gautier, De Maupassant, and Loti-together with editorials on the oddest subjects, revealing his love of recondite research. These beautiful bits of belles-lettres were eagerly sought and read by a small but enthusiastic clientèle. In this fashion appeared the contents of three of his earlier works: 'One of Cleopatra's Nights,' 'Stray Leaves from Strange Literature,' and 'Some Chinese Ghosts.' To this period also belongs his collection of Creole proverbs published in 1885, under the title of 'Gombo Zhêbes,' which was the result of laborious study of oral literature.

A visit paid in the summer of 1884 to Grande Isle, one of the islands lying in the Gulf of Mexico, resulted in his successful novelette 'Chita, A Story of Last Island,' which was originally published in the Times-Democrat under the name of "Torn Letters." It won wider recognition than had been accorded to any previous efforts, and 'Chita' enabled him to carry out his cherished ambition of penetrating farther into the tropics. The Harpers, the publishers of his last tale, commissioned him to undertake the journey for them, and in 1887 he left New Orleans to sail for the Windward Islands. He went as far south as British Guiana, and during his sojourn wrote a number of travel-sketches, which appeared in Harper's Magazine. The tropical world infatuated him, and after finishing the work assigned to him by the Harpers, he returned to live in Martinique. His next book, 'Two Years in the French West Indies,' was the outcome of his experiences and presented a minute and brilliant record of his vivid impressions.

New York, after a lapse of almost twenty years, again saw Lafcadio Hearn in 1889, when he returned there to correct the final proofs of 'Chita' before its issuance in book form. Money was not plentiful, however, and only by dint of extraordinary labor—the translation of Anatole France's 'Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard' in a couple of weeks—did he manage to keep his head above water. Finally he made an arrangement with the Harpers to go to Japan and write articles from there, after the same manner as his West Indian essays. The route chosen was by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on May 8, 1890, Lafcadio Hearn left for the East never to return to America.

During the voyage he discovered that the artist with him was to receive more than double the pay allowed him. Abruptly he severed his contract. Fortunately he had a letter of introduction to Paymaster Mitchell McDonald, a young American naval officer stationed at Yokohama, and the letter opened the way for the stranger. In August, 1890, Professor Basil Hall Chamberlain secured him a position in a school at Matsue, and here he began making those now well-known studies of the Japanese people, their customs, manners and civilization, which continued for an uninterrupted period of fourteen years, and of which 'Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan' (1894) was the first volume, and 'Japan; an Interpretation' (1904) the last. Lafcadio Hearn became a favorite with his pupils and with the Japanese people at large. In January, 1891, he married Setsu Loizumi, a lady of high Samurai rank. Thereupon he renounced his English allegiance to become a subject of the Mikado, that his children might never suffer a doubtful position. He was adopted into his wife's family, and assumed their name together with the personal title "Yakumo," which signifies "Eight-clouds."

Matsue proved too severe a climate for him and he was transferred to the Great Government College at Kumamoto, the town in which his first child was born. Three years later, in 1895, he again changed his place of residence by removing to Kobe, where he engaged in journalistic work on the Chronicle. But the work told upon his weak eyesight, and he was compelled to abandon it. Through the influence of Professor Chamberlain he was given the position of Professor of English in the Imperial University of Tokio, where he remained a number of years. His salary was comparatively large, but not enough to support his increasing family. Constant ill-health, too, depleted his literary energies, and so hindered that source of income. During 1902, he wrote to American friends invoking their aid in securing work among them, and a course of lectures was arranged for Cornell University. Fate was against him, however, in the form of refusal to leave Tokio University even for a lecture-season, and this led to resignation. Then an epidemic of typhoid at Ithaca depleted Cornell funds and the authorities withdrew from their contract. The gloomy prospect was somewhat relieved by negotiations with the University of London for a series of lectures and by his securing the chair of English at the Weseda University; but violent illness intervened which left him broken. On the twenty-sixth of September, 1904, while walking on his veranda, he died suddenly, and his burial was effected according to Buddhistic rites. A critic, speaking of him, said he was "the one alien who is the true adopted child of the Japanese mysteries."

THE TRADITION OF THE TEA-PLANT

From 'Some Chinese Ghosts,' Copyright by Little, Brown and Company. Used by permission of the publishers.

"Good is the continence of the eye;
Good is the continence of the ear;
Good is the continence of the nostrils;
Good is the continence of the tongue;
Good is the continence of the body;
Good is the continence of speech;
Good is all. . . ."

Again the Vulture of Temptation soared to the highest heaven of his contemplation, bringing his soul down, down, reeling and fluttering, back to the World of Illusion. Again the memory made dizzy his thought, like the perfume of some venomous flower. Yet he had seen the bayadere for an instant only, when passing through Kasi upon his way to China, -to the vast empire of souls that thirsted after the refreshment of Buddha's law, as sun-parched fields thirst for the lifegiving rain. When she called him, and dropped her little gift into his mendicant's bowl, he had indeed lifted his fan before his face, yet not quickly enough; and the penalty of that fault had followed him a thousand leagues-pursued after him even into the strange land to which he had come to bear the words of the Universal Teacher. Accursed beauty! surely framed by the Tempter of tempters, by Mara himself, for the perdition of the just! Wisely had Bhagayat warned his disciples: "O ye Çramanas, women are not to be looked upon! And if ye chance to meet women, ye must not suffer your eyes to dwell upon them; but, maintaining holy reserve, speak not to them at all. Then fail not to whisper unto your own hearts, 'Lo, we are Çramanas, whose duty it is to remain uncontaminated by the corruptions of this world, even as the Lotos, which suffereth no vileness to cling unto its leaves, though it blossom amid the refuse of the wayside ditch.'" Then also came to his memory, but with a new and terrible meaning, the words of the Twentieth-and-Third of the Admonitions:—

"Of all attachments unto objects of desire, the strongest indeed is the attachment to form. Happily, this passion is unique; for were there any other like unto it, then to enter the Perfect Way were impossible."

How, indeed, thus haunted by the illusion of form, was he to fulfil the vow that he had made to pass a night and a day in perfect and unbroken meditation? Already the night was beginning! Assuredly, for sickness of the soul, for fever of the spirit, there was no physic save prayer. The sunset was swiftly fading out. He strove to pray:—

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!

"Even as the tortoise withdraweth its extremities into its shell, let me, O Blessed One, withdraw my senses wholly into meditation!

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!

"For even as rain penetrateth the broken roof of a dwelling long uninhabited, so may passion enter the soul uninhabited by meditation.

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!

"Even as still water that hath deposited all its slime, so let my soul, O Tathâgata, be made pure! Give me strong power to rise above the world, O Master, even as the wild bird rises from its marsh to follow the pathway of the Sun!

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!

"By day shineth the sun, by night shineth the moon; shineth also the warrior in harness of war; shineth likewise in meditations the Çramana. But the Buddha at all times, by night or by day, shineth ever the same, illuminating the world.

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!

"Let me cease, O thou Perfectly Awakened, to remain as an Ape in the World-forest, forever ascending and descending in search of the fruits of folly. Swift as the twining of serpents, vast as the growth of lianas in a forest, are the allencircling growths of the Plant of Desire.

"O the Jewel in the Lotos!"

Vain his prayer, alas! vain also his invocation! The mystic meaning of the holy text—the sense of the Lotos, the sense of the Jewel-had evaporated from the words, and their monotonous utterance now served only to lend more dangerous definition to the memory that tempted and tortured him. O the jewel in her ear! What lotos-bud more dainty than the folded flower of flesh, with its dripping of diamond-fire! Again he saw it, and the curve of the cheek beyond, luscious to look upon as beautiful brown fruit. How true the Two Hundred and Eighty-fourth verse of the Admonitions!—"So long as a man shall not have torn from his heart even the smallest rootlet of that liana of desire which draweth his thought toward women, even so long shall his soul remain fettered." And there came to his mind also the Three Hundred and Forty-Fifth verse of the same blessed book, regarding fetters:

"In bonds of rope, wise teachers have said, there is no strength; nor in fetters of wood, nor yet in fetters of iron. Much stronger than any of these is the fetter of concern for the jewelled earrings of women."

"Omniscient Gotama!" he cried—"all-seeing Tathâgata! How multiform the consolation of Thy Word! how marvellous Thy understanding of the human heart! Was this also one of Thy temptations?—one of the myriad illusions marshalled before Thee by Mara in that night when the earth rocked as a chariot, and the sacred trembling passed from sun to sun, from system to system, from universe to universe, from eternity to eternity?"

O the jewel in her ear! The vision would not go! Nay, each time it hovered before his thought it seemed to take a warmer life, a fonder look, a fairer form; to develop with his weakness; to gain force from his enervation. He saw the eyes, large, limpid, soft, and black as a deer's; the pearls in the dark hair, and the pearls in the pink mouth; the lips curling to a kiss, a flower-kiss; and a fragrance seemed to float to his senses, sweet, strange, soporific—a perfume of youth, an odor of woman. Rising to his feet, with strong resolve he pronounced again the sacred invocation; and he recited the holy words of the Chapter of Impermanency:

"Gazing upon the heavens and upon the earth ye must say, These are not permanent. Gazing upon the mountains and the rivers, ye must say, These are not permanent. Gazing upon the forms and upon the faces of exterior beings, and beholding their growth and their development, ye must say, These are not permanent."

And nevertheless! how sweet illusion! The illusion of the great sun; the illusion of the shadow-casting hills; the illusion of waters, formless and multiform; the illusion of—Nay, nay! what impious fancy! Accursed girl! yet, yet! why should he curse her? Had she ever done aught to merit the malediction of an ascetic? Never, never! Only her form, the memory of her, the beautiful phantom of her, the accursed phantom of her! What was she? An illusion creating illusions, a mockery, a dream, a shadow, a vanity, a vexation of spirit! The fault, the sin, was in himself, in his rebellious thought, in his untamed memory. Though mobile as water, intangible as vapor, Thought, nevertheless, may be tamed by the Will, may be harnessed to the chariot of Wisdom—must be!—that happiness be found. And he recited the blessed verses of the "Book of the Way of the Law":—

"All forms are only temporary." When this great truth is fully comprehended by any one, then is he delivered from all pain. This is the Way of Purification.

"All forms are subject unto pain." When this great truth is fully comprehended by any one, then is he delivered from all pain. This is the Way of Purification.

"All forms are without substantial reality." When this great truth is fully comprehended by any one, then is he delivered from all pain. This is the way of . . .

Her form, too, unsubstantial, unreal, an illusion only, though comeliest of illusions? She had given him alms! Was the merit of the giver illusive also—illusive like the grace of the supple fingers that gave? Assuredly there were mysteries in the Abhidharma impenetrable, incomprehensible!

. . . It was a golden coin, stamped with the symbol of an elephant—not more of an illusion, indeed, than the gifts of Kings to the Buddha! Gold upon her bosom also, less fine than the gold of her skin. Naked between the silken sash and the narrow breast-corslet, her young waist curved glossy and pliant as a bow. Richer the silver in her voice than in the hollow pagals that made a moonlight about her ankles! But her smile!—the little teeth like flower-stamens in the perfumed blossom of her mouth!

O weakness! O shame! How had the strong Charioteer of Resolve thus lost his control over the wild team of fancy! Was this languor of the Will a signal of coming peril, the peril of slumber? So strangely vivid those fancies were, so brightly definite, as about to take visible form, to move with factitious life, to play some unholy drama upon the stage of dreams! "O Thou Fully Awakened!" he cried aloud, "help now Thy humble disciple to obtain the blessed wakefulness of perfect contemplation! let him find force to fulfil his vow! suffer not Mara to prevail against him!" And he recited the eternal verses of the Chapter of Wakefulness:—

"Completely and eternally awake are the disciples of Gotama! Unceasingly, by day and night, their thoughts are fixed upon the Law.

"Completely and eternally awake are the disciples of Gotama! Unceasingly, by day and night, their thoughts are fixed upon the Community.

"Completely and eternally awake are the disciples of Gotama! Unceasingly, by day and night, their thoughts are fixed upon the Body.

"Completely and eternally awake are the disciples of Gotama! Unceasingly, by day and night, their minds know the sweetness of perfect peace.

"Completely and eternally awake are the disciples of Gotama! Unceasingly, by day and night, their minds enjoy the deep peace of meditation."

There came a murmur to his ears; a murmuring of many voices, smothering the utterances of his own, like a tumult of waters. The stars went out before his sight; the heavens darkened their infinities: all things became viewless, became blackness; and the great murmur deepened, like the murmur of a rising tide; and the earth seemed to sink from beneath him. His feet no longer touched the ground; a sense of supernatural buoyancy pervaded every fiber of his body: he felt himself floating in obscurity; then sinking softly, slowly, like a feather dropped from the pinnacle of a temple. Was this death? Nay, for all suddenly, as transported by the Sixth Supernatural Power, he stood again in light—a perfumed, sleepy light, vapory, beautiful—that bathed the marvellous streets of some Indian city. Now the nature of the murmur became manifest to him; for he moved with a mighty throng, a people of pilgrims, a nation of worshippers. But these were not of his faith; they bore upon their foreheads the smeared symbols of obscene gods! Still, he could not escape from their midst: the mile-broad human torrent bore him irresistibly with it, as a leaf is swept by the waters of the Ganges. Rajahs were there with their trains, and princes riding upon elephants, and Brahmins robed in their vestments, and swarms of voluptuous dancing-girls, moving to chant of kabit and damâri. But whither, whither? Out of the city into the sun they passed, between avenues of banyan, down colonnades of palm. But whither, whither?

Blue-distant, a mountain of carven stone appeared before them—the Temple, lifting to heaven its wilderness of chiselled pinnacles, flinging to the sky the golden spray of its decoration. Higher it grew with approach, the blue tones changed to gray, the outlines sharpened in the light. Then each detail became visible: the elephants of the pedestals standing upon tortoises of rock; the great grim faces of the capitals; the serpents and monsters writhing among the friezes; the many-headed gods of basalt in their galleries of fretted niches, tier above tier; the pictured foulnesses, the painted lusts, the divinities of abomination. And, yawning in the sloping precipice of sculpture, beneath a frenzied swarming of gods and Gopia—a beetling pyramid of limbs and bodies interlocked—the Gate, cavernous and shadowy as the mouth of Siva, devoured the living multitude.

The eddy of the throng whirled him with it to the vastness of the interior. None seemed to note his yellow robe, none even to observe his presence. Giant aisles intercrossed their heights above him; myriads of mighty pillars, fantastically carven, filed away to invisibility behind the yellow illumination of torch-fires. Strange images, weirdly sensuous, loomed up through haze of incense. Colossal figures, that at a distance assumed the form of elephants or garuda-birds, changed aspect when approached, and revealed as the secret of their design an interplaiting of the bodies of women; while one divinity rode all the monstrous allegories—one divinity or demon, eternally the same in the repetition of the sculptor, universally visible as though self-multiplied. The huge pillars themselves were symbols, figures, carnalities; the orgiastic spirit of that worship lived and writhed in the contorted bronze of the lamps, the twisted gold of the cups, the chiselled marble of the tanks. . . .

How far had he proceeded? He knew not; the journey among those countless columns, past those armies of petrified gods, down lanes of flickering lights, seemed longer than the voyage of a caravan, longer than his pilgrimage to China! But suddenly, inexplicably, there came a silence as of cemeteries; the living ocean seemed to have ebbed away from about him, to have been engulfed within abysses of subterranean architecture! He found himself alone in some strange crypt before a basin, shell-shaped and shallow, bearing in its centre a rounded column of less than human height, whose smooth and spherical summit was wreathed with flowers. Lamps similarly formed, and fed with oil of palm, hung above it. There was no other graven image, no visible divinity. Flowers of countless varieties lay heaped upon the pavement; they covered its surface like a carpet, thick, soft; they exhaled their ghosts beneath his feet. The perfume seemed to penetrate his brain—a perfume sensuous, intoxicating, unholy; an unconquerable languor mastered his will, and he sank to rest upon the floral offerings.

The sound of a tread, light as a whisper, approached through the heavy stillness, with a drowsy tinkling of pagals, a tintinnabulation of anklets. All suddenly he felt glide about his neck the tepid smoothness of a woman's arm. She, she!

his Illusion, his Temptation; but how transformed, transfigured!—preternatural in her loveliness, incomprehensible in her charm! Delicate as a jasmine-petal the cheek that touched his own; deep as night, sweet as summer, the eyes that watched him. "Heart's-thief," her flower-lips whispered—"heart's-thief, how have I sought for thee! How have I found thee! Sweets I bring thee, my beloved; lips and bosom; fruit and blossom. Hast thirst? Drink from the well of mine eyes! Wouldst sacrifice? I am thine altar! Wouldst pray? I am thy God!"

Their lips touched; her kiss seemed to change the cells of his blood to flame. For a moment Illusion triumphed; Mara prevailed! . . . With a shock of resolve the dreamer awoke in the night—under the stars of the Chinese sky.

Only a mockery of sleep! But the vow had been violated, the sacred purpose unfulfilled! Humiliated, penitent, but resolved, the ascetic drew from his girdle a keen knife, and with unfaltering hands severed his eyelids from his eyes, and flung them from him. "O Thou Perfectly Awakened!" he prayed, "Thy disciple hath not been overcome save through the feebleness of the body; and his vow hath been renewed. Here shall he linger, without food or drink, until the moment of its fulfilment." And having assumed the hieratic posture—seated himself with his lower limbs folded beneath him, and the palms of his hands upward, the right upon the left, the left resting upon the sole of his upturned foot—he resumed his meditation.

Dawn blushed; day brightened. The sun shortened all the shadows of the land, and lengthened them again, and sank at last upon his funeral pyre of crimson-burning cloud. Night came and glittered and passed. But Mara had tempted in vain. This time the vow had been fulfilled, the holy purpose accomplished.

And again the sun arose to fill the world with laughter of light; flowers opened their hearts to him; birds sang their morning hymn of fire worship; the deep forest trembled with delight; and far upon the plain, the eaves of many-storied temples and the peaked caps of the city-towers caught aureate glory. Strong in the holiness of his accomplished vow, the Indian pilgrim arose in the morning glow. He started for amazement as he lifted his hands to his eyes. What! was everything a dream? Impossible! Yet now his eyes felt no pain; neither were they lidless; not even so much as one of their lashes was lacking. What marvel had been wrought? In vain he looked for the severed lids that he had flung upon the ground; they had mysteriously vanished. But lo! there where he had cast them two wondrous shrubs were growing, with dainty leaflets eyelid-shaped, and snowy buds just opening to the East.

Then, by virtue of the supernatural power acquired in that mighty meditation, it was given the holy missionary to know the secret of that newly created plant—the subtle virtue of its leaves. And he named it, in the language of the nation to whom he brought the Lotos of the Good Law, "TE"; and he spake to it, saying:—

"Blessed be thou, sweet plant, beneficent, life-giving, formed by the spirit of virtuous resolve! Lo! the fame of thee shall yet spread unto the ends of the earth; and the perfume of thy life be borne unto the uttermost parts by all the winds of heaven! Verily, for all time to come men who drink of thy sap shall find such refreshment that weariness may not overcome them nor languor seize upon them; neither shall they know the confusion of drowsiness, nor any desire for slumber in the hour of duty or of prayer. Blessed be thou!"

And still, as a mist of incense, as a smoke of universal sacrifice, perpetually ascends to heaven from all the lands of earth the pleasant vapor of TE, created for the refreshment of mankind by the power of a holy vow, the virtue of a pious atonement.

O. HENRY William Sidney Porter)

O. HENRY

[1862-1910]

C. ALPHONSO SMITH

Ι

F the work of William Sidney Porter, better known as O. Henry, was the most noteworthy contribution made to American literature during the first decade of the twentieth century, the expanding vogue of that work has no less characterized the succeeding decade. He was hardly a national author at the time of his death in 1910, but in 1920 he seems securely national and international. The largest class of midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy was recently asked to name in writing the author whose complete works, if placed in the library of every American battleship, would be most often called for. O. Henry led by two hundred votes. Mark Twain coming second. It will be recalled also that at the autograph sales held in New York at the American Art Galleries early in 1918 a twelve-page letter from O. Henry, already published, sold for $810, while an unpublished autobiographical manuscript by Mark Twain, consisting of fourteen pages, brought only $540. "If I had discovered him before his death," wrote Sir James M. Barrie, "I should have considered a trip to the United States well worth while to make his acquaintance." But nothing ever said of O. Henry would have pleased him more than a sentence from a London paper during the great war: "We ought to be reading our casualty lists, for God knows they are heavy enough; but, instead, we are all reading O. Henry." The appreciation of O. Henry came to England, however, only after effort. "It was not easy for the British public to 'get' O. Henry at first," said Sir Ernest Hodder Williams during his recent visit to New York. "They had to try. But they've got him now, and all over England you hear O. Henry being quoted."

The World War, by the way, was a severe test to the popularity of writers, living and dead, American and European. It brought in a new audience, with new interests, with changed or changing ideals, with a refashioned outlook. Ordinary appeals seemed exhausted, for the world had been reduced to the bare elementals again. But the elemental facts of human nature, the essential traits of the human heart, are precisely those that gave O. Henry both theme and arena. O. Henry entered Europe via the French trenches because the French trenches spelled the common denominator of human nature. "O. Henry was our greatest literary discovery during the war," writes John o'London,¹ "He was medicinal. He distracted us from intolerable things. His name is as familiar as that of Kipling, Conan Doyle, or Jacobs." Writing of actual life in the trenches Frank A. Lewis² reports that, when Options was received, "an hour of insane jubilation ensued." The book was torn at once into its seventeen separate stories, the pages were pinned together, and seventeen soldiers feasted synchronously on seventeen stories instead of successively on one volume. Of course the war served to postpone the translation of O. Henry into foreign tongues; but he can now be read in German, Swedish, Dano-Norwegian, French, Spanish, and Japanese. When we add to this that five million volumes of his stories have been sold and that his vogue is steadily increasing among readers of all classes, it need hardly be reaffirmed that the chief current in American literature from 1910 to 1920 has been that issuing from the stories written by O. Henry in the ten years preceding.

II

O. Henry's life falls into four clearly marked stages, each stage contributing a definite quota to his training and a distinctive flavor to his writing.

- (1) He was born in Greensboro, North Carolina, September 11, 1862 (not 1867), where he remained until 1882, and where the O. Henry Hotel now testifies to the local esteem in which his memory is held. His schooling was limited, but his reading was wide and avid. "I did more reading," he said, "between my thirteenth and nineteenth years than I have ever done in all the years since, and my taste at that time was much better than it is now, for I used to read nothing but the classics. Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy and Lane's translation of The Arabian Nights were my favorites." A count of all the books and authors referred to by him in his stories shows that the great Perso-Arabian classic stands well among the first. The Bible leads with sixty-three references. Shakespeare follows with thirty-four; Tennyson with twentyone; The Arabian Nights with fourteen; Kipling with twelve; Byron and Dickens with seven each; Omar Khayyam with six; Conan Doyle with five; Cæsar, Marcus Aurelius, Keats, and Henry James each with four. The total number of authors alluded to directly or indirectly is one hundred and twenty-three, the number of references being three hundred and thirty-six. But O. Henry took with him from Greensboro not only a love of good books but an ability as a humorous cartoonist that gave evidence, before the age of ten, of rare constructive and interpretative talent. The man who was later to be acclaimed as the short story historian of New York City began by being the annalist of Greensboro through his cartoons.
 - (2) From 1882 to 1896 he lived in Texas, first on a ranch, then in Austin, then in Houston, with occasional visits to San Antonio. His out-of-doors life on the plains gave material that was afterwards to appear not only in pictorial description and vivid narrative but in a wealth of first-hand observation, in a widening of personal experience, and in a breaking away from mere bookishness, that find illustration in every page of his Heart of the West. It was not a summer visitor that wrote that book. It was one who had lived the life and loved it; it was one who needed just this wider horizon to give him margin for comparison with what had gone before and basis for contrast with what was to come later. His reading partook now more of the nature of study. He mastered Spanish, pored over the great historians that he found in a ranch library, pitted his narrative art against theirs, and learned in constant comradeship with Webster's Unabridged Dictionary an accuracy and freedom in the use of words that random reading could not give. During these seven years also he practised the cartoonist's art as before, not, so far as I can learn, with a view to utilizing it, but merely for the pleasure that he found in some form of disciplined selfexpression. In Austin he edited The Rolling Stone and in Houston he contributed Postscripts and Pencillings to the Daily Post.

(3) The third stage, that from July, 1896, to July, 1901, made him what he became, not only a master of the short story, but a thinker about human life, a delver into its mysteries, an appraiser of its conflicts, a noble exemplar of its hidden but unconquerable reserves. Out of these five years was wrought the philosophy that makes The World and the Door a permanent contribution to the literature of humanitarian reform. For more than six months of this time he was a wanderer, "a fugitive from justice"—so the indictment runs—in Central and South America. The charge was that, while acting as paying and receiving teller in the First National Bank of Austin, he had misappropriated funds, a charge not only baseless but susceptible of easy disproof had not a whim of the moment sped him on his fateful and compromising tour among the Latin-Americans. Returning to Austin to nurse his dving wife, O. Henry surrendered himself to the authorities, asserted his innocence of the charge made against him, and after a brief trial was sentenced to the federal prison in Columbus, Ohio. He entered the prison on April 25, 1808, and without a demerit against him was released on July 24, 1901. It was here that he wrote his first twelve stories and assumed the now famous pseudonym, O. Henry. The name was taken without change from the United States Dispensatory which he used when he was a drug clerk in Greensboro, Austin, and Columbus. It is the abbreviation of the name of a famous French pharmacist, Etienne-Ossian Henry.1

(4) From Columbus O. Henry went at once to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, where his daughter and her grandparents were then living. But in the spring of 1902 he moved to New York City, where he died on June 5, 1910. He was buried in Asheville, North Carolina, the home of his second wife, where he had sought and seemingly found restoration to health and where his grave is visited annually by many thousands of devoted tourists. It was in New York that O. Henry's genius culminated, though he did not devote himself wholeheartedly to the absorption and reproduction of the great city until he had harvested his Latin-American experiences by the publication in November, 1904, of Cabbages and Kings. His real flowering period began in December, 1903, when he signed a contract with The New York World for a story a week. The price was a hundred dollars a story. The responsibility thus imposed, with all that it promised of release from need and uncertainty, was a challenge that evoked for the first time in his life every ounce of energy and determination that he possessed. His training had been varied and thorough, and the passion for self-expression that had burned in him from childhood found now a happy and adequate outlet. "The city teaches the man," said Simonides. It not only taught O. Henry, but released in him the powers and appetencies that had before been cramped or caged. During the first month of his contract he contributed not only the required four stories to The Sunday World, but one each to Ainslee's, McClure's, and Everybody's. This amazing quota of seven stories he repeated in February, May, and December of the following year. A marked falling off in the number but not in the quality of his stories becomes noticeable early in 1907. Ill health had gripped him and inspiration lagged. His total output of stories, if we omit fragments and early extravaganzas, is two hundred and fifty.

III

"Grammar, to O. Henry," says an English critic,¹ "was only one way of saying a thing. He had others equally efficient when he wanted, for he was a master, and not a servant, of words. For two years in Texas his favourite companion was a dictionary—which he studied as lovingly as some men study poetry." O. Henry was a conformist and a non-conformist; but conformity and non-conformity were governed by the same law, the law of effect. Few writers knew words better than he or felt more instinctively their limitations as well as their possibilities. Words had more than meaning to O. Henry: they had flavor, a flavor unknown to Noah Webster, but recognized by every poet and prose writer who has enriched the resources of our speech. To most writers the dictionary says "You must," to O. Henry it said "You may," and the freedom thus imparted has contributed no little of the sparkle and humor and suggestiveness of O. Henry's vocabulary.

He had no pet words, at least no pet coinages, if we except "accusive." The word is not found in any dictionary, but it is so aptly used by

O. Henry—in "accusive eyes," "accusive talk", "accusive silence"—that it deserves a place in the dictionaries of the future. His mastery is seen, however, not only in new formations but in new uses. He writes of "the petitionary music of a violin," the rattle of cabs and "the snarling of the electric cars," "the stale infestivity of a table d'hôte," "a flashy fellow with a predatory eye," a tramp obeying his surly master "with propitiatory alacrity," "the priceless and induplicable flag," a woman tiding over "the vast chasms of nicotinized silence" with music from her guitar, an atmosphere "international with cigarette smoke," "cheap fellows, sonorously garbed," a man "with salamandrous thumbs, serving the scalding viands." These words are all in the lexicographer's stable but the harnessing is O. Henry's.

When O. Henry takes liberties with the form of words rather than with their meanings, his so-called audacities suggest comparison with those that Sheridan immortalized in the speech of Mrs. Malaprop. But there is a fundamental difference. Mrs. Malaprop says: You must "illiterate him quite from your memory"; don't try "to extirpate your-self"; he is "a progeny of learning"; a certain woman does not "reprehend the true meaning of what she is saying"; I laid "my positive conjunctions on her never to think on the fellow again"; someone is as headstrong as "an allegory on the banks of the Nile," etc. These are blunders adroitly chosen by Sheridan, but they are nothing more than blunders. They cause laughter, but they do not quicken thought. They belong in the same class with the verbal mutilations of Mrs. Slipslop in Fielding's Joseph Andrews.

But O. Henry's audacities mark a distinct advance. Instead of making nonsense they suggest sense. Apart from their humor they often drive home the intended idea with a vividness impossible to any other words. Compare the malapropisms already cited with these O. Henryisms: There was an Indian Territory feud of which I was press-agent, camp-follower, and "inaccessory during the fact"; it was a large, conglomerate building, "presided under by a janitor"; the third day of the rain, Andy walked out to the edge of the town "to view the mudscape"; he was a fierce little old man who "regarded himself as especial mastiffin-waiting to protect the two young artists"; the duty of the Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World is "to offer a cast-ironical welcome to the oppressed of other lands"; for table-talk and fireside companions, sheep "rank along with five-o'clock teazers"; if you know anything about the thief, "you are amiable to the law in not reporting it"; it [a town named Guayaquerita] is a clear case where Spelling Reform "ought to butt in and disenvowel it"; Clara, the negro servant, spoke in tones "half-contemptuous, half-Tuskegeenial."

O. Henry's made or misused words, like Sheridan's and Fielding's, resemble in sound the canonical words, but instead of having no meaning they are made to carry a new meaning. We laugh not merely because standardized forms have been unceremoniously shattered, but because out of the fragments there suddenly emerges a new and unexpected idea. In Sheridan we admire the brilliant consistency with which Mrs. Malaprop's arrows fall wide of the mark. In O. Henry we admire the added cleverness that speeds the arrow not to its conventional target, it is true, but not to the ground; it glances from its goal and strikes squarely another target which we did not know was in that neighborhood. Mrs. Malaprop mutilates; O. Henry transmutes.

A similar difference is seen between O. Henry's cleverest misquotations and the misquotations of other humorists. A study of the question would show, I think, three general stages in the art of humorous misquotation. The first stage is illustrated by Chaucer's rooster who flatters and pacifies his wife at the end of a long controversy by telling her:

For, also siker as In principio, Mulier est hominis confusio. Madame, the sentence of this Latin is— Womman is mannes joye and al his blis.

Here there is no tampering with the quoted words. They are given accurately by Chauntecleer, liberty being taken with the translation rather than with the quotation proper. O. Henry rarely attempts this kind of inversion, though his most notable example happens to be drawn, as was Chaucer's, from a Latin quotation. Thus Henry Horsecollar is made to say: "Then we'll export canned music to the Latins; but I'm mindful of Mr. Julius Cæsar's account of 'em where he says: 'Omnis Gallia in tres partes divisa est'; which is the same as to say, 'We will need all of our gall in devising means to tree them parties." The second stage in the evolution of effective misquotation brings Mrs. Malaprop again to the fore. She differs from Chauntecleer in quoting inaccurately but, as before, no new meaning or application is superadded to the quotation as a whole. As in the case of individual words, Sheridan makes her blunder and blunder egregiously, but there is no scintillation from the blunder. It is mere mutilation. "Then his presence," she says, "is so noble! I protest when I saw him, I thought of what Hamlet says in the play: - 'Hesperian curls-the front of Job himself!an eye, like March, to threaten at command!—a station, like Harry Mercury, new-'? Something about kissing-on a hill-however, the similitude struck me directly."

In the third stage, O. Henry's priority and primacy seem to me equally assured. Jeff Peters, for example, in explanation of how he and another gentle grafter lost their booty, remarks: "We were self-curbed. It was a case of auto-suppression. There was a rift within the loot, as Albert Tennyson says." In another passage Jeff tells how a mine owner, having lost his fortune, climbs to the top of a house and jumps off on a spot "where he now requiescats in pieces." Andy Tucker, Jeff's partner, wants to go to the Riviera for leisure and meditation: "I want to loaf and indict my soul, as Walt Whittier says." A con-noisseur in the ordering of fashionable dinners is described as one "to the menu born." Spenser's famous warning in The Faerie Queene, "Be bolde, be bolde, and everywhere be bolde. Be not too bolde," is changed into "Be bold; everywhere be bold, but be not bowled over." "A straw vote," says O. Henry, "only shows which way the hot air blows." "Strong drink," we are assured, "is an adder and subtractor, too." A perfect example of the difference between autocracy and democracy is seen in O. Henry's metamorphosis of Tennyson's line into "the fierce light that beats upon the thrown-down." Many other examples might be given, but enough have been cited to show that in forays of this sort O. Henry's endeavor was to bring home a new message from time worn expressions. He pours new wine into old bottles. This is essentially different from Chaucer's practice and from Sheridan's. O. Henry tries to be re-constructive where they are usually content to be negative or destructive.

But O. Henry's humor is not at bottom verbal. It does not inhere in tricks of style or in mannerisms of phrase. He had only one mannerism, a way of massing alliteration. With the poets alliteration is chiefly a matter of euphony; but O. Henry uses it to condense, to heighten, to intensify, to lift quantity or quality into quick and vivid saliency. It takes the place of more elaborate description as well as of more detailed enumeration. When he says the outing was to include "parks, picnics, and Pilsener," I detect an almost parsimonious economy of words. When he describes the cattlemen of an older day as "grandees of the grass, kings of the kine, lords of the lea, barons of beef and bone." I feel that nouns cunningly marshaled have beat adjectives even at the adjectival game. When he declares that "the Madness of Manhattan, the Frenzy of Fuss and Feathers, the Bacillus of Brag, the Provincial Plague of Pose seized upon Towers Chandler," I know that Towers is in for a fall. When he pits an empty-headed Apollo against a suave tongue and adds: "It's the larynx that the beauty doctors ought to work on. It's words more than warts, talk more than talcum, palaver more than powder, blarney more than bloom that counts-the phonograph instead of the photograph," I am convinced as by a deluge of cogent argumentation. When Mrs. Widdup is introduced as "fair, flustered, forty, and foxy," I know her and know her unforgettably both exteriorly and interiorly.

But O. Henry's humor is only marginally a thing of words and phrases. Coruscation, in other words, was with O. Henry merely the by-product of creation. It was never central or controlling. His characters are not humorous because they say funny things. They say funny things because they are humorous. O. Henry's humor has been acclaimed by a world of grateful readers because, like the humor of Shakespeare and Molière and Cervantes, it rises naturally and spontaneously from the situations in which his characters are placed. The situations become themselves creative; they belong to the elemental nature of comedy. They are matrix rather than mould, and the humor is born rather than made. Review the situations in The Handbook of Hymen, A Cosmopolite in a Café, The Brief Début of Tildy, A Lickpenny Lover, Two Renegades, The Gift of the Magi, The Cop and the Anthem, Makes the Whole World Kin, The Lady Higher Up, The Pendulum, The Making of a New Yorker. In each of these the stage is set by a master. There is subtle thought, even profound thought, not so much in the working out of the plots as in the selection and forestaging of such humorous situations as make the plots work themselves out. Humor is released rather than manufactured. It plays hide and seek with pathos in many of these stories and not infrequently both humor and pathos come before the footlights hand in hand to receive the plaudits of an audience that finds it hard to say which is which.

A special distinction of O. Henry's humor is that it is never divisive. On the contrary, it fuses and re-unites. As soon as you read one of his stories you want to read it aloud to others. But you do not have to pick your audience for fear that feelings will be hurt. Rich or poor, educated or illiterate, employer or employee, black or white, man or woman-all will find their common heritage of humanity reached and enriched. Much of the stage humor of today, certainly that of the school of Wilde and Shaw, derives most of its sparkle from what has been called "the neat reversal of middle-class conceptions." There is no such reversal in O. Henry. Instead of pitting class against class he reveals class to class. In Mammon and the Archer, for example, it would be hard to say which is the more human and lovable, Aunt Ellen, who is gentle and sentimental and spiritual, or Anthony Rockwall, the retired manufacturer and proprietor of Rockwall's Eureka Soap, who "bets his money on money every time." Read the story and try to make the award. In The Handbook of Hymen, the matter-offact man is contrasted with the ultra-imaginative man, the statistical with the poetical mind. In its two leading characters the story is a sort of miniature Don Quixote: Sanderson Pratt, like Sancho Panza, is the factualist; Idaho Green, like the Knight de la Mancha, is the romanticist. But the balances swing impartial at the end. Neither devotee is derided. The theme is illuminated, but the two contestants are awarded equal honors by the reader. Both characters are extremists, but they are too human, too much like you and me, for O. Henry's ridicule to fall on either.

In The Duplicity of Hargraves, Best Seller, The Rose of Dixie, and Thimble, Thimble, O. Henry sets himself the task of staging the traditional differences between the Southerner and the Northerner. The subject was a delicate one, but there is no tincture of prejudice in the portrayal. Is not O. Henry the only one of our fictionists in whose hands regional differences never curdle into sectional differences? He finds his differential and makes it clear as day, but Yankee and Southerner join equally in the laughter. The differential is seen to be but a rill in the river of our common humanity; it discloses but it neither dissevers nor discredits. Makes the Whole World Kin is the title of only one of O. Henry's stories, but it sums the service of them all.

One element in O. Henry's art seems not to have been touched on by the critics, an element that is as distinctive as his humor. I mean the way in which he saturates his stories with the atmosphere of the background. The French call it milieu, the Germans stimmung, but O. Henry has added something to both. I do not refer now to the larger geographical backgrounds. It goes without saying that his Latin-American stories are accurately Latin-American, that his New York stories have the New York atmosphere, that his Western stories are distinctively Western, and that his Southern stories have the flavor of the South. But O. Henry goes further than this. He circumscribes his locale and makes it a perceptible force in the development of the story. Rooms, boarding houses, hotels, stores, cafés, restaurants, ranches, parks, squares, streets, and street intersections are almost human in O. Henry. If they do not speak, they have life, character, temperament. Stories are commonly divided into three parts, background or setting, character or characters, plot or plan; and the first is thought of as the stationary locale where the story takes place. In many stories the locale is mentioned at the beginning and then dismissed. Not so in O. Henry's pages. His backgrounds are no more initial than terminal. They are They constitute a felt presence in the conduct of the continuous. characters. O. Henry was not only a student of environment; he was an interpreter of character in its relations to environment. He read men and women in their context. This is why it is so difficult to re-tell an O. Henry story effectively. We name the characters, we summarize the plot, we explain the point of it all, we say where the story takes place. But something has gone out of it. That something is the encompassing and vitalizing background. When we have mentioned or described the locale, we are done with it. But in the story it was inwrought into the very texture of the style. It conditioned the talk; it flavored the adjectives; it nominated the nouns; it moved with the verbs. Try to re-tell The Brief Début of Tildy, a perfectly simple plot, but so shot through with the restaurant atmosphere that to omit it is to omit the integration of the plot itself.

O. Henry touches upon this theme in A Matter of Mean Elevation: "It has been named 'environment,' which is as weak a word as any to express the unnamable kinship of man to nature, that queer fraternity that causes stones and trees and salt water and clouds to play upon our emotions. Why are we made serious and solemn and sublime by mountain heights, grave and contemplative by an abundance of overhanging trees, reduced to inconstancy and monkey capers by the ripples on a sandy beach?" But the environments into which O. Henry pushes his prow are man-made rather than nature-made. Run through a dozen or more of his stories with this thought of environment as one of the co-operant characters in the unfolding of the incidents. If you do not crown O. Henry as the laureage of the background, you will at least be put in the way of having your own powers of correlate observation enriched as by a sixth sense. If you have time for but one story in this quest, go at once to The Furnished Room (in The Four Million). To my mind it is O. Henry's greatest story, though there is no humor in it. But it is environment probed to its ultimate depth; it is Poe in all his "totality of effect"; it is Hawthorne when he wrote The House of the Seven Gables; it is Shakespeare when he set the weird sisters upon the heath to croak the curtained doom of Macbeth.

But notice that in O. Henry environment never, as so often in Thomas Hardy, compels character. It co-operates with it, it releases it, it trains it, at times it checks it. But man is still the master of his fate. Environment may help or hinder; it may not subjugate. O. Henry's own life is a radiant example of how adversity may be reversed, how a stumbling block may be transmuted into a stepping stone. Like the good witch, O. Henry read the spell of an unjust prison sentence backwards and made a fairy appear instead of a goblin. If in Roads of Destiny, written in 1903, he seems to lean to the theory of the immalleable environment, remember that three years later he grapples again with the theme in The Roads We Take and has Bob Tidball sum it all up in the words: "It ain't the roads we take; it's what's inside of us that makes us turn out the way we do."

In the matter of technique proper, much has been written of the art with which O. Henry holds in suspense the full meaning of his stories till the very end. "On the technical side of his craft," writes the English critic already quoted,1 "he has probably never been surpassed either in fertility or ingenuity." But the critics have overlooked the art of O. Henry's beginnings. It is the masterly beginning that makes possible the masterly ending, and the ending cannot be properly appraised unless viewed in relation to the beginning. "The flower was unexpected," says Goethe, "even surprising, if you will; but it had to come. The green leaves existed only for it, and without it the leaves would not have been there." Craftsmanship with O. Henry was largely a relation between first words and last words. It had to do, far more than has been thought, with the proper placing of expository matter. Should it come first or last? This was the subject of one of O. Henry's latest conversations about his craft. In one of his stories, after a page and a half of initial explanation, he says, "All this recitative by the chorus is only to bring us to the point where you may be told why," etc. The real purpose of the "recitative by the chorus" is to release a clean, unincumbered ending. When the job is done, he wants neither shavings nor dust left over. "A story with a moral appended," he remarks at the beginning of The Gold That Glittered, "is like the bill of a mosquito. It bores you, and then injects a stinging drop to irritate your conscience. Therefore let us have the moral first and be done with it." But why have it at all? Because the end requires it. In The Gift of the Magi, the moral comes last. The real surprise in this wonderful story is not in what the lovers do at the last; it is in what O. Henry says about what they do. He congratulates them. They acted wisely. Their gifts were prompted by love, and the love shines all the more resplendent because the gifts as gifts could not be used. They could be treasured as memorials of a devotion that was selfless in its purpose and unsparing in its effort. But all this belongs to the moral rather than to the plot, and it could not have come first without depriving the plot of its terminal unexpectedness. The projected surprise was latent in the title. The theme is not the gifts of the magi: it is love, the gift of the magi, and the last paragraph tells us so.

O. Henry's usual practice, however, is to place the moral, the nature of the theme, the expository matter, first, so that the story may end without the anhang of concluding remarks. Note the ending in A Municipal Report, "I wonder what's doing in Buffalo!" This would be meaningless unless O. Henry had with pre-visioning care given the clue at the beginning. The story is meant to show that not only New York and New Orleans and San Francisco but all other cities have narrative and dramatic possibilities. Where there is actual life there is potential literature. Turn again to An Unfinished Story, one of those that made Colonel Roosevelt say: "All the reforms that I attempted in behalf of the working girls of New York were suggested by the writings of O. Henry." The dynamic ending is made possible only by the most careful charging of the battery at the beginning. In fact the story proper is thrust between the beginning and the ending of a dream, and the reverberation at the close is merely the quick coming together of the two parts after the lightning has flashed between. In Roads of Destiny there is a different ending for each of the three roads traversed, but each ending couches in the great question with which the story begins:

I go to seek on many roads

What is to be.

True heart and strong, with love to light—
Will they not bear me in the fight
To order, shun or wield or mould

My Destiny?

In the stories, therefore, that discuss or illumine a definite theme, as most of O. Henry's stories do, the carefully concealed surprise at the end is to be credited more to skill in ordered exposition than to any trick of narration or artificiality of structure. The strategy employed belongs more to the expositor in O. Henry than to the narrator. He had not so much a tale to tell as a truth to expound, a new point of view to impress, a novel suggestion to make, a complexity of human nature to unravel, an obscure motive to illumine, a daring reach of imaginative sympathy to achieve, and the story partakes of the nature of a modern parable. Surprise, therefore, is hardly the right word to express the reader's sensation when he finishes a story of this sort. Recognition would be a better word, recognition of the bearing of part upon part, of totality in place of mere successiveness, of convergence instead of parallelism, of the end as the child of the beginning. Surprise is usually an accompaniment of this kind of recognition, but the pleasure is more in the recognition of the author's masterly adaptation than in the surprise itself.

IV

No sketch of O. Henry is complete without a reference to the man that was in the artist. It was my privilege to know him intimately till at the age of twenty he left North Carolina for Texas. We fished together, seined, hunted, camped out, and serenaded together, and the memory of his personality is as rich a heritage as the treasury of his genius. A few letters from him in Texas, some intermittent copies of The Rolling Stone, a long interview in New York when he was at the height of his fame-these are almost my only first-hand memorials after he had exchanged our common birthplace, Greensboro, for the Texas ranch. But there was no essential change. O. Henry was still Will Porter. As I waited for him in the lobby of a New York hotel in 1908, I doubted whether I should even know him. Twenty-six years had passed and to him they had brought tragedy as well as triumph. But the smile was the same—the soft voice, the slow gait, the quick gaze that sought to disguise its own penetration-there was no change here. But he was tired and looked it. He did not complain but asked eagerly about our boyhood friends, recalling incidents and sayings and little funny things as if they had happened yesterday. Of his own achievement he spoke deprecatingly. No man of equal distinction ever lived who shunned laudation and publicity more than O. Henry. He enjoyed his art in exact proportion as it received his own inner commendation. "Write to please yourself," he said. Do not be swerved by the presupposed tastes or expectations of any magazine or newspaper or reading public. The advice has been called worthless, but it is the only advice that genius, if true to itself, can give.

He kept to the last a gentleness, a sympathy, a cleanness of bearing, a reverence for womanhood, and an equal reverence for childhood that bespoke a nature ineradicably pure and wholesome. He was never even remotely effeminate, but there was much about him that one associates with healthy boyhood and unspoiled girlhood. One of his critics complain because O. Henry "slaps his reader on the back and laughs loudly in a barroom." O. Henry probably never in his life slapped anyone the back or laughed boisterously. To see these traits in his writing's you must contribute them yourself. The briefest acquaintance with him as boy or man would have convinced the critic that he might as well ascribe roystering to Dante or rowdyism to Whittier as to lay them at O. Henry's door. Is it possible that other readers so misinterpret the man from his works?

I do not believe that anyone ever came to know him in Greensboro. Texas, Columbus, or New York, who did not find love taking precedence of mere admiration. He was certainly the best loved boy in Greensboro. and all the interviews that I have had with those who were thrown intimately with him in later years tell the same story. Snobbishness he detected instantly and despised, for in every fiber of his being he was a democrat, a lover of his kind, especially of those seemingly down and out. A woman in New York said that she had almost despaired of making a living by her pen when, to her great surprise, O. Henry's card was brought in. She had never seen him, but had worshiped at a distance. He had heard of her plight, had learned that her stories had been rejected as regularly as they had been submitted, and had called to talk matters over. "This story is not at all bad," he said, when she had been prevailed upon to let him see her latest offering. "It's excellent. Let me suggest a change, a few minor changes, here and there." The story as thus modified was sent again on its rounds and a check for $750 was the immediate response. He loved to do things of this sort even when he had not a dollar in his pocket.

No story that he ever composed brings him back so vividly to me as do the lines that he wrote about himself to a stranger: "I was born and raised in 'No'th Ca'llina' and at eighteen went to Texas and ran wild on the prairies. Wild yet, but not so wild. Can't get to loving New Yorkers. Live all alone in a great big two rooms on quiet old Irving Place three doors from Wash. Irving's old home. Kind of lonesome. Was thinking lately (since the April moon commenced to shine) how I'd like to be down South, where I could happen over to Miss Ethel's or Miss Sallie's and sit down on the porch-not on a chair -on the edge of the porch, and lay my straw hat on the steps and lay my head back against the honeysuckle on the post-and just talk. And Miss Ethel would go in directly (they say 'presently' up here) and bring out the guitar. She would complain that the E string was broken, but no one would believe her; and pretty soon all of us would be singing the 'Swanee River' and 'In the Evening by the Moonlight' and-oh, gol darn it, what's the use of wishing?"

That is Will Porter as we knew him and loved him. It is O. Henry, too. But one note is lacking. We knew that in the Greensboro days childhood and womanhood evoked all the knightliness of his nature. But we did not know and the world did not know that, through all the sequent years of struggle and testing, the heart of a child and the heart of a woman had been the court of final appeal to which he had silently but resolutely shaped the issues of his life. He has told us in a few stanzas found on his desk when he died. He called his lines The Crucible. In the technique of his life, this bit of unexpected poetry is the surprise at the end. But, as in the endings of his stories, recognition takes precedence of surprise, recognition of a personality that kept faith with itself and from morning song to evening song held high the banner of a pure and potent idealism.

Hard ye may be in the tumult, Red to your battle hilts, Blow give for blow in the foray, Cunningly ride in the tilts; But when the roaring is ended, Tenderly, unbeguiled, Turn to a woman a woman's Heart, and a child's to a child.

Test of the man if his worth be In accord with the ultimate plan, That he be not to his marring, Always and utterly man: That he bring out of the tumult, Fitter and undefiled. To a woman the heart of a woman, To children the heart of a child.

Good when the bugles are ranting It is to be iron and fire: Good to be oak in the foray, Ice to a guilty desire. But when the battle is over (Marvel and wonder the while) Give to a woman a woman's Heart, and a child's to a child.

TWO RENEGADES

From Roads of Destiny. Copyright, 1909, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission. The story appeared first in Everybody's Magasine, August, 1904.

In the Gate City of the South the Confederate Veterans were reuniting; and I stood to see them march, beneath the tangled flags of the great conflict, to the hall of their oratory and commemoration.

While the irregular and halting line was passing I made onslaught upon it and dragged forth from the ranks my friend Barnard O'Keefe, who had no right to be there. For he was a Northerner born and bred; and what should he be doing hallooing for the Stars and Bars among those gray and moribund veterans? And why should he be trudging, with his shining, martial, humorous, broad face, among those warriors of a previous and alien generation?

I say I dragged him forth, and held him till the last hickory leg and waving goatee had stumbled past. And then I hustled him out of the crowd into a cool interior; for the Gate City was stirred that day, and the hand-organs wisely eliminated "Marching Through Georgia" from their repertories.

"Now, what deviltry are you up to?" I asked of O'Keefe when there were a table and things in glasses between us.

O'Keefe wiped his heated face and instigated a commotion among the floating ice in his glass before he chose to answer.

"I am assisting at the wake," said he, "of the only nation on earth that ever did me a good turn. As one gentleman to another, I am ratifying and celebrating the foreign policy of the late Jefferson Davis, as fine a statesman as ever settled the financial question of a barrel of money for a barrel of flour—a pair of $20 bills for a pair of boots—a hatful of currency for a new hat—say, ain't that simple compared with W. J. B.'s little old oxidized plank?"

"What talk is this?" I asked. "Your financial disgression is merely a subterfuge. Why were you marching in the ranks of the Confederate Veterans?"

"Because, my lad," answered O'Keefe, "the Confederate Government in its might and power interposed to protect and defend Barnard O'Keefe against immediate and d'angerous assassination at the hands of a blood-thirsty foreign country after the United States of America had overruled his appeal for protection, and had instructed Private Secretary Cortelyou to reduce his estimate of the Republican majority for 1905 by one vote."

"Come, Barney," said I, "the Confederate States of America has been out of existence nearly forty years. You do not look older yourself. When was it that the deceased government exerted its foreign policy in your behalf?"

"Four months ago," said O'Keefe promptly. "The infamous foreign power I alluded to is still staggering from the official blow dealt it by Mr. Davis's contraband aggregation of states. That's why you see me cake-walking with the ex-rebs to the illegitimate tune about 'simmon-seeds and cotton. I vote for the Great Father in Washington, but I am not going back on Mars' Jeff. You say the Confederacy has been dead forty years? Well, if it hadn't been for it, I'd have been breathing to-day with soul so dead I couldn't have whispered a single cuss-word about my native land. The O'Keefes are not overburdened with ingratitude."

I must have looked bewildered. "The war was over," I said vacantly, "in—"

O'Keefe laughed loudly, scattering my thoughts.

"Ask old Doc Millikin if the war is over!" he shouted, hugely diverted. "Oh, no! Doc hasn't surrendered yet. And the Confederate States! Well, I just told you they bucked officially and solidly and nationally against a foreign government four months ago and kept me from being shot. Old Jeff's country stepped in and brought me off under its wing while Roosevelt was having a gunboat repainted and waiting for the National Campaign Committee to look up whether I had ever scratched the ticket."

"Isn't there a story in this, Barney?" I asked.

"No," said O'Keefe; "but I'll give you the facts. You know I went down to Panama when this irritation about a canal began. I thought I'd get in on the ground floor. I did, and had to sleep on it, and drink water with little zoos in it; so, of course, I got the chagres fever. That was in a little town called San Juan on the coast.

"After I got the fever hard enough to kill a Port-au-Prince nigger, I had a relapse in the shape of Doc Millikin.

"There was a doctor to attend a sick man! If Doc Millikin had your case, he made the terrors of death seem like an invitation to a donkey-party. He had the bedside manners of a Piute medicine-man and the soothing presence of a dray loaded with iron bridge-girders. When he laid his hand on your fevered brow you felt like Cap John Smith just before Pocahontas went his bail.

"Well, this old medical outrage floated down to my shack when I sent for him. He was built like a shad, and his eyebrows was black, and his white whiskers trickled down from his chin like milk coming out of a sprinkling-pot. He had a nigger boy along carrying an old tomato-can full of calomel, and a saw.

"Doc felt my pulse, and then he began to mess up some calomel with an agricultural implement that belonged to the trowel class.

"'I don't want any death-mask made yet, Doc,' I says, 'nor my liver put in a plaster-of-Paris cast. I'm sick; and it's medicine I need, not frescoing.'

"'You're a blame Yankee, ain't you?" asks Doc, going on mixing up his Portland cement.

"I'm from the North,' says I, 'but I'm a plain man, and don't care for mural decorations. When you get the Isthmus all asphalted over with that boll-weevil prescription, would you mind giving me a dose of pain-killer, or a little strychnine on toast to ease up this feeling of unhealthiness that I have got?'

"'They was all sassy, just like you,' says old Doc, 'but we lowered their temperature considerable. Yes, sir, I reckon we sent a good many of ye over to old mortuis nisi bonum. Look at Antietam and Bull Run and Seven Pines and around Nashville! There never was a battle where we didn't lick ye unless you was ten to our one. I knew you was a blame Yankee the minute I laid eyes on you.'

"'Don't re-open the chasm, Doc,' I begs him. "Any Yankeeness I may have is geographical; and, as far as I am concerned, a Southerner is as good as a Filipino any day. I'm feeling too bad to argue. Let's have secession without misrepresentation, if you say so; but what I need is more laudanum and less Lundy's Lane. If you're mixing that compound gefloxide of gefloxicum for me, please fill my ears with it before you get around to the battle of Gettysburg, for there is a subject full of talk.'

"By this time Doc Millikin had thrown up a line of fortifications on square pieces of paper; and he says to me: 'Yank, take one of these powders every two hours. They won't kill you. I'll be around again about sundown to see if you're alive.'

"Old Doc's powders knocked the chagres. I stayed in San Juan, and got to knowing him better. He was from Mississippi, and the red-hottest Southerner that ever smelled mint. He made Stonewall Jackson and R. E. Lee look like 'Abolitionists. He had a family somewhere down near Yazoo City; but he stayed away from the States on account of an uncontrollable liking he had for the absence of a Yankee government. Him and me got as thick personally as the Emperor of Russia and the dove of peace, but sectionally we didn't amalgamate.

"'Twas a beautiful system of medical practice introduced by old Doc into that isthmus of land. He'd take that bracketsaw and the mild chloride and his hypodermic, and treat anything from yellow fever to a personal friend.

"Besides his other liabilities Doc could play a flute for a minute or two. He was guilty of two tunes—'Dixie' and another one that was mighty close to the 'Suwanee River'— you might say one of its tributaries. He used to come down and sit with me while I was getting well, and aggrieve his flute and say unreconstructed things about the North. You'd have thought the smoke from the first gun at Fort Sumter was still floating around in the air.

"You know that was about the time they staged them property revolutions down there, that wound up in the fifth act with the thrilling canal scene where Uncle Sam has nine curtain-calls holding Miss Panama by the hand, while the bloodhounds keep Senator Morgan treed up in a cocoanut-palm.

"That's the way it wound up; but at first it seemed as if Colombia was going to make Panama look like one of the $3.98 kind, with dents made in it in the factory, like they wear at North Beach fish fries. For mine, I played the straw-hat crowd to win; and they gave me a colonel's commission over a brigade of twenty-seven men in the left wing and second joint of the insurgent army.

"The Colombian troops were awfully rude to us. One day when I had my brigade in a sandy spot, with its shoes off doing a battalion drill by squads, the Government army rushed from behind a bush at us, acting as noisy and disagreeable as they could.

"My troops enfiladed, left-faced, and left the spot. After enticing the enemy for three miles or so we struck a brierpatch and had to sit down. When we were ordered to throw up our toes and surrender we obeyed. Five of my best staffofficers fell, suffering extremely with stone-bruised heels.

"Then and there those Colombians took your friend Barney, sir, stripped him of the insignia of his rank, consisting of a pair of brass knuckles and a canteen of rum, and dragged him before a military court. The presiding general went through the usual legal formalities that sometimes cause a case to hang on the calendar of a South American military court as long as ten minutes. He asked me my age, and then sentenced me to be shot.

"They woke up the court interpreter, an American named

Jenks, who was in the rum business and vice versa, and told him to translate the verdict.

"Jenks stretched himself and took a morphine tablet.

"'You've got to back up against th' 'dobe, old man,' says he to me. 'Three weeks, I believe, you get. Haven't got a chew of fine-cut on you, have you?'

"'Translate that again, with foot-notes and a glossary,' says I. 'I don't know whether I'm discharged, condemned, or handed over to the Gerry Society.'

"'Oh,' says Jenks, 'don't you understand? You're to be stood up against a 'dobe wall and shot in two or three weeks—three, I think, they said.'

"'Would you mind asking 'em which?' says I. 'A week don't amount to much after you are dead, but it seems a real nice long spell while you are alive.'

"'It's two weeks,' says the interpreter, after inquiring in Spanish of the court. 'Shall I ask 'em again?'

"'Let be,' says I. 'Let's have a stationary verdict. If I keep on appealing this way they'll have me shot about ten days before I was captured. No, I haven't got any fine-cut.'

"They sends me over to the calaboza with a detachment of coloured postal-telegraph boys carrying Enfield rifles, and I am locked up in a kind of brick bakery. The temperature in there was just about the kind mentioned in the cooking recipes that call for a quick oven.

"Then I gives a silver dollar to one of the guards to send for the United States consul. He comes around in pajamas, with a pair of glasses on his nose and a dozen or two inside of him.

"'I'm to be shot in two weeks,' says I. 'And although I've made a memorandum of it, I don't seem to get it off my mind. You want to call up Uncle Sam on the cable as quick as you can and get him all worked up about it. Have 'em send the Kentucky and the Kearsarge and the Oregon down right away. That'll be about enough battleships; but it wouldn't hurt to have a couple of cruisers and a torpedo-boat destroyer, too. And—say, if Dewey isn't busy, better have him come along on the fastest one of the fleet.'

"'Now, see here, O'Keefe,' says the consul, getting the best of a hiccup, 'what do you want to bother the State Department about this matter for?'

"'Didn't you hear me?' says I; 'I'm to be shot in two weeks. Did you think I said I was going to a lawn-party? And it wouldn't hurt if Roosevelt could get the Japs to send down the Yellowyamtiskookum or the Ogotosingsing or some other first-class cruisers to help. It would make me feel safer.'

"'Now, what you want,' says the consul, 'is not to get excited. I'll send you over some chewing tobacco and some banana fritters when I go back. The United States can't interfere in this. You know you were caught insurging against the government, and you're subject to the laws of this country. Tell you the truth, I've had an intimation from the State Department—unofficially, of course—that whenever a soldier of fortune demands a fleet of gunboats in a case of revolutionary katzenjammer, I should cut the cable, give him all the tobacco he wants, and after he's shot take his clothes, if they fit me, for part payment of my salary.'

"'Consul,' says I to him, 'this is a serious question. You are representing Uncle Sam. This ain't any little international tomfoolery, like a universal peace congress or the christening of the Shamrock IV. I'm an American citizen and I demand protection. I demand the Mosquito fleet, and Schley, and the Atlantic squadron, and Bob Evans, and General E. Byrd Grubb, and two or three protocols. What are you going to do about it?'

"'Nothing doing,' says the consul.

"'Be off with you, then,' says I, out of patience with him, 'and send me Doc Millikin. Ask Doc to come and see me.'

"Doc comes and looks through the bars at me, surrounded by dirty soldiers, with even my shoes and canteen confiscated, and he looks mightily pleased.

"'Hello, Yank,' says he, 'getting a little taste of Johnson's Island, now, ain't ye?'

"'Doc,' says I, 'I've just had an interview with the U. S. consul. I gather from his remarks that I might just as well have been caught selling suspenders in Kishineff under the name of Rosenstein as to be in my present condition. It seems that the only maritime aid I am to receive from the United States is some navy-plug to chew. Doc,' says I, 'can't you suspend hostilities on the slavery question long enough to do something for me?'

"'It ain't been my habit,' Doc Millikin answers, 'to do any painless dentistry when I find a Yank cutting an eyetooth. So the Stars and Stripes ain't landing any marines to shell the huts of the Colombian cannibals, hey? Oh, say, can you see by the dawn's early light the star-spangled banner has fluked in the fight? What's the matter with the War Department, hey? It's a great thing to be a citizen of a gold-standard nation, aint' it?'

"'Rub it in, Doc, all you want,' says I. 'I guess we're weak on foreign policy.'

"'For a Yank,' says Doc, putting on his specs and talking more mild, 'you ain't so bad. If you had come from below the line I reckon I would have liked you right smart. Now since your country has gone back on you, you have to come to the old doctor whose cotton you burned and whose mules you stole and whose niggers you freed to help you. Ain't that so, Yank?'

"'It is,' says I heartily, 'and let's have a diagnosis of the case right away, for in two weeks' time all you can do is to hold an autopsy and I don't want to be amputated if I can help it.'

"'Now,' says Doc, business-like, 'it's easy enough for you to get out of this scrape. Money'll do it. You've got to pay a long string of 'em from General Pomposo down to this anthropoid ape guarding your door. About $10,000 will do the trick. Have you got the money?'

"'Me?' says I. 'I've got one Chili dollar, two real pieces, and a medio.'

"Then if you've any last words, utter 'em,' says that old reb. 'The roster of your financial budget sounds quite much to me like the noise of a requiem.'

"'Change the treatment,' says I. 'I admit that I'm short. Call a consultation or use radium or smuggle me in some saws or something.'

"'Yank,' says Doc Millikin, 'I've a good notion to help you. There's only one government in the world that can get you out of this difficulty; and that's the Confederate States of America, the grandest nation that ever existed.'

"Just as you said to me I says to Doc: 'Why, the Confederacy ain't a nation. It's been absolved forty years ago.'

"'That's a campaign lie,' says Doc. 'She's running along as solid as the Roman Empire. She's the only hope you've got. Now, you, being a Yank, have got to go through with some preliminary obsequies before you can get official aid. You've got to take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government. Then I'll guarantee she does all she can for you. What do you say, Yank?—it's your last chance.'

"'If you're fooling with me, Doc,' I answers, 'you're no better than the United States. But as you say it's the last chance, hurry up and swear me. I always did like corn whisky and 'possum anyhow. I believe I'm half Southerner by nature. I'm willing to try the Ku-Klux in place of the khaki. Get brisk.'

"Doc Millikin thinks awhile, and then he offers me this oath of allegiance to take without any kind of a chaser:

"'I, Barnard O'Keefe, Yank, being of sound body but a Republican mind, hereby swear to transfer my fealty, respect, and allegiance to the Confederate States of America, and the government thereof in consideration of said government, through its official acts and powers, obtaining my freedom and release from confinement and sentence of death brought about by the exuberance of my Irish proclivities and my general pizenness as a Yank.'

"I repeated these words after Doc, but they seemed to me a kind of hocus-pocus; and I don't believe any life-insurance company in the country would have issued me a policy on the strength of 'em.

"Doc went away saying he would communicate with his government immediately.

"Say—you can imagine how I felt—me to be shot in two weeks and my only hope for help being in a government that's been dead so long that it isn't even remembered except on Decoration Day and when Joe Wheeler signs the voucher for his pay-check. But it was all there was in sight; and somehow I thought Doc Millikin had something up his old alpaca sleeve that wasn't all foolishness.

"Around to the jail comes old Doc again in about a week. I was flea-bitten, a mite sarcastic, and fundamentally hungry.

"'Any Confederate ironclads in the offing?' I asks 'Do you notice any sounds resembling the approach of Jeb Stewart's cavalry overland or Stonewall Jackson sneaking up in the rear? If you do, I wish you'd say so.'

"'It's too soon yet for help to come,' says Doc.

"'The sooner the better,' says I. 'I don't care if it gets in fully fifteen minutes before I am shot; and if you happen to lay eyes on Beauregard or Albert Sidney Johnston or any of the relief corps, wig-wag 'em to hike along.'

"'There's been no answer received yet,' says Doc.

"'Don't forget,' says I, 'that there's only four days more. I don't know how you propose to work this thing, Doc,' I says to him; 'but it seems to me I'd sleep better if you had got a government that was alive and on the map—like Afghanistan or Great Britain, or old man Kruger's kingdom, to take this matter up. I don't mean any disrespect to your Confederate States, but I can't help feeling that my chances of being pulled out of this scrape was decidedly weakened when General Lee surrendered.'

"'It's your only chance,' said Doc; 'don't quarrel with it. What did your own country do for you?'

"It was only two days before the morning I was to be shot, when Doc Milliken came around again.

"'All right, Yank,' says he. 'Help's come. The Confederate States of America is going to apply for your release. The representatives of the government arrived on a fruit-steamer last night.'

"'Bully!' says I—'bully for you, Doc! I suppose it's marines with a Gatling. I'm going to love your country all I can for this'

"'Negotiations,' says old Doc, 'will be opened between the two governments at once. You will know later on today if they are successful.'

"About four in the afternoon a soldier in red trousers brings a paper round to the jail, and they unlocks the door and I walks out. The guard at the door bows and I bows, and I steps into the grass and wades around to Doc Millikin's shack.

"Doc was sitting in his hammock playing 'Dixie,' soft and low and out of tune, on his flute. I interrupted him at 'Look away! look away!' and shook his hand for five minutes.

"'I never thought,' says Doc, taking a chew fretfully, 'that I'd ever try to save any blame Yank's life. But, Mr. O'Keefe, I don't see but what you are entitled to be considered part human, anyhow. I never thought Yanks had any of the rudiments of decorum and laudability about them. I reckon I might have been too aggregative in my tabulation. But it ain't me you want to thank—it's the Confederate States of America.'

"'And I'm much obliged to 'em,' says I. 'It's a poor man that wouldn't be patriotic with a country that's saved his life. I'll drink to the Stars and Bars whenever there's a flag-staff and a glass convenient. But where,' says I, 'are the rescuing troops? If there was a gun fired or a shell burst, I didn't hear it.'

"Doc Millikin raises up and points out the window with his flute at the banana-steamer loading with fruit.

"'Yank,' says he, 'there's a steamer that's going to sail in the morning. If I was you, I'd sail on it. The Confederate Government's done all it can for you. There wasn't a gun fired. The negotiations was carried on secretly between the two nations by the purser of that steamer. I got him to do it because I didn't want to appear in it. Twelve thousand dollars was paid to the officials in bribes to let you go.'

"'Man!' says I, sitting down hard—'twelve thousand—how will I ever—who could have—where did the money come from?'

"'Yazoo City,' says Doc Millikin; 'I've got a little saved up there. Two barrels full. It looks good to these Colombians. 'Twas Confederate money, every dollar of it. Now do you see why you'd better leave before they try to pass some of it on an expert?'

"'I do,' says I.

"'Now let's hear you give the password,' says Doc Milli-kin.

"'Hurrah for Jeff Davis!' says I.

"'Correct,' says Doc. 'And let me tell you something: The next tune I learn on my flute is going to be "Yankee Doodle." I reckon there's some Yanks that are not so pizen. Or, if you was me, would you try "The Red, White, and Blue"?'"

AN UNFINISHED STORY

From The Four Million. Copyright, 1906, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission. First published in McClure's Magazine, August, 1905.

We no longer groan and heap ashes upon our heads when the flames of Tophet are mentioned. For even the preachers have begun to tell us that God is radium, or ether or some scientific compound, and that the worst we wicked ones may expect is a chemical reaction. This is a pleasing hypothesis; but there lingers yet some of the old, goodly terror of orthodoxy.

There are but two subjects upon which one may discourse with a free imagination, and without the possibility of being controverted. You may talk of your dreams; and you may tell what you heard a parrot say. Both Morpheus and the bird are incompetent witnesses; and your listener dare not attack your recital. The baseless fabric of a vision, then, shall furnish my theme—chosen with apologies and regrets—instead of the more limited field of pretty Polly's small talk.

I had a dream that was so far removed from the higher criticism that it had to do with the ancient, respectable, and lamented bar-of-judgment theory.

Gabriel had played his trump; and those of us who could not follow suit were arraigned for examination. I noticed at one side a gathering of professional bondsmen in solemn black and collars that buttoned behind; but it seemed there was some trouble about their real estate titles; and they did not appear to be getting any of us out.

A fly cop—an angel policeman—flew over to me and took me by the left wing. Near at hand was a group of very prosperous-looking spirits arraigned for judgment.

"Do you belong with that bunch?" the policeman asked.

"Who are they?" was my answer.

"Why," said he, "they are-"

But this irrevelant stuff is taking up space that the story should occupy.

Dulcie worked in a department store. She sold Hamburg edging, or stuffed peppers, or automobiles, or other little trinkets such as they keep in department stores. Of what she earned, Dulcie received six dollars per week. The remainder was credited to her and debited to somebody else's account in the ledger kept by G—— Oh, primal energy, you say, Reverend Doctor— Well then, in the Ledger of Primal Energy.

During her first year in the store, Dulcie was paid five dollars per week. It would be instructive to know how she lived on that amount. Don't care? Very well; probably you are interested in larger amounts. Six dollars is a larger amount. I will tell you how she lived on six dollars per week.

One afternoon at six, when Dulcie was sticking her hatpin within an eighth of an inch of her medulla oblongata, she said to her chum, Sadie—the girl that waits on you with her left side:

"Say, Sade, I made a date for dinner this evening with Piggy."

"You never did!" exclaimed Sadie admiringly. "Well, ain't you the lucky one? Piggy's an awful swell; and he always takes a girl to swell places. He took Blanche up to the Hoffman House one evening, where they have swell music, and you see a lot of swells. You'll have a swell time, Dulce."

Dulcie hurried homeward. Her eyes were shining, and her cheeks showed the delicate pink of life's—real life's—approaching dawn. It was Friday; and she had fifty cents left of her last week's wages.

The streets were filled with the rush-hour floods of people. The electric lights of Broadway were glowing—calling moths from miles, from leagues, from hundreds of leagues out of darkness around to come in and attend the singeing school. Men in accurate clothes, with faces like those carved on cherry stones by the old salts in sailors' homes, turned and stared at Dulcie as she sped, unheeding, past them. Manhattan, the night-blooming cereus, was beginning to unfold its deadwhite, heavy-odoured petals.

Dulcie stopped in a store where goods were cheap and bought an imitation lace collar with her fifty cents. That money was to have been spent otherwise—fifteen cents for supper, ten cents for breakfast, ten cents for lunch. Another dime was to be added to her small store of savings; and five cents was to be squandered for licorice drops—the kind that made your cheek look like the toothache, and last as long. The licorice was an extravagance—almost a carouse—but what is life without pleasures?

Dulcie lived in a furnished room. There is this difference between a furnished room and a boarding-house. In a furnished room, other people do not know it when you go hungry.

Dulcie went up to her room—the third floor back in a West Side brownstone front. She lit the gas. Scientists tell us that the diamond is the hardest substance known. Their mistake. Landladies know of a compound beside which the diamond is as putty. They pack it in the tips of gas-burners; and one may stand on a chair and dig at it in vain until one's fingers are pink and bruised. A hairpin will not remove it; therefore let us call it immovable.

So Dulcie lit the gas. In its one-fourth-candle-power glow we will observe the room.

Couch-bed, dresser, table, washstand, chair—of this much the landlady was guilty. The rest was Dulcie's. On the dresser were her treasures—a gilt china vase presented to her by Sadie, a calendar issued by a pickle works, a book on the divination of dreams, some rice powder in a glass dish, and a cluster of artificial cherries tied with a pink ribbon.

Against the wrinkly mirror stood pictures of General Kitchener, William Muldoon, the Duchess of Marlborough, and Benvenuto Cellini. Against one wall was a plaster of Paris plaque of an O'Callahan in a Roman helmet. Near it was a violent oleograph of a lemon-coloured child assaulting an inflammatory butterfly. This was Dulcie's final judgment in art; but it had never been upset. Her rest had never been disturbed by whispers of stolen copes; no critic had elevated his eyebrows at her infantile entomologist.

Piggy was to call for her at seven. While she swiftly makes ready, let us discretely face the other way and gossip.

For the room, Dulcie paid two dollars per week. On week-days her breakfast cost ten cents; she made coffee and cooked an egg over the gaslight while she was dressing. On Sunday mornings she feasted royally on veal chops and pineapple fritters at "Billy's" restaurant, at a cost of twenty-five cents—and tipped the waitress ten cents. New York presents so many temptations for one to run into extravagance.

She had her lunches in the department-store restaurant at a cost of sixty cents for the week; dinners were $1.05. The evening papers—show me a New Yorker going without his daily paper!—came to six cents; and two Sunday papers—one for the personal column and the other to read—were ten cents. The total amounts to $4.76. Now, one has to buy clothes, and—

I give it up. I hear of wonderful bargains in fabrics, and of miracles performed with needle and thread; but I am in doubt. I hold my pen poised in vain when I would add to Dulcie's life some of those joys that belong to woman by virtue of all the unwritten, sacred, natural, inactive ordinances of the equity of heaven. Twice she had been to Coney Island and had ridden the hobby-horses. 'Tis a weary thing to count your pleasures by summers instead of by hours.

Piggy needs but a word. When the girls named him, an undeserving stigma was cast upon the noble family of swine. The words-of-three-letters lesson in the old blue spelling book begins with Piggy's biography. He was fat; he had the soul of a rat, the habits of a bat, and the magnanimity of a cat. . . . He wore expensive clothes; and was a connoisseur in starvation. He could look at a shop-girl and tell you to an hour how long it had been since she had eaten anything more nourishing than marshmallows and tea. He hung about the shopping districts, and prowled around in department stores with his invitations to dinner. Men who escort dogs upon the streets at the end of a string look down upon him. He is a type; I can dwell upon him no longer; my pen is not the kind intended for him; I am no carpenter.

At ten minutes to seven Dulcie was ready. She looked at herself in the wrinkly mirror. The reflection was satisfactory. The dark blue dress, fitting without a wrinkle, the hat with its jaunty black feather, the but-slightly-soiled gloves—all representing self-denial, even of food itself—were vastly becoming.

Dulcie forgot everything else for a moment except that she was beautiful, and that life was about to lift a corner of its mysterious veil for her to observe its wonders. No gentleman had ever asked her out before. Now she was going for a brief moment into the glitter and exalted show.

The girls said that Piggy was a "spender." There would be a grand dinner, and music, and splendidly dressed ladies to look at, and things to eat that strangely twisted the girls jaws when they tried to tell about them. No doubt she would be asked out again.

There was a blue pongee suit in a window that she knew—by saving twenty cents a week instead of ten, in—let's see—Oh, it would run into years! But there was a second-hand store in Seventh Avenue where—

Somebody knocked at the door. Dulcie opened it. The landlady stood there with a spurious smile, sniffing for cooking by stolen gas.

"A gentleman's downstairs to see you," she said. "Name is Mr. Wiggins."

By such epithet was Piggy known to unfortunate ones who had to take him seriously.

Dulcie turned to the dresser to get her handkerchief; and then she stopped still, and bit her under lip hard. While looking in her mirror she had seen fairyland and herself, a princess, just awakening from a long slumber. She had forgotten one that was watching her with sad, beautiful, stern eyes—the only one there was to approve or condemn what she did. Straight and slender and tall, with a look of sorrowful reproach on his handsome, melancholy face, General Kitchener fixed his wonderful eyes on her out of his gilt photograph frame on the dresser.

Dulcie turned like an automatic doll to the landlady.

"Tell him I can't go," she said dully. "Tell him I'm sick, or something. Tell him I'm not going out."

After the door was closed and locked, Dulcie fell upon her bed, crushing her black tip, and cried for ten minutes. General Kitchener was her only friend. He was Dulcie's ideal of a gallant knight. He looked as if he might have a secret sorrow, and his wonderful moustache was a dream, and she was a little afraid of that stern yet tender look in his eyes. She used to have little fancies that he would call at the house sometime, and ask for her, with his sword clanking against his high boots. Once, when a boy was rattling a piece of chain against a lamp-post she had opened the window and looked out. But there was no use. She knew that General Kitchener was away over in Japan, leading his army against the savage Turks; and he would never step out of his gilt frame for her. Yet one look from him had vanquished Piggy that night. Yes, for that night.

When her cry was over Dulcie got up and took off her best dress, and put on her old blue kimono. She wanted no dinner. She sang two verses of "Sammy." Then she became intensely interested in a little red speck on the side of her nose. And after that was attended to, she drew up a chair to the rickety table, and told her fortune with an old deck of cards.

"The horrid, impudent thing!" she said aloud. "And I never gave him a word or a look to make him think it!"

At nine o'clock Dulcie took a tin box of crackers and a little pot of raspberry jam out of her trunk, and had a feast. She offered General Kitchener some jam on a cracker; but he only looked at her as the sphinx would have looked at a butterfly—if there are butterflies in the desert,

"Don't eat it if you don't want to," said Dulcie. "And don't put on so many airs and scold so with your eyes. I wonder if you'd be so superior and snippy if you had to live on six dollars a week."

It was not a good sign for Dulcie to be rude to General Kitchener. And then she turned Benvenuto Cellini's face downward with a severe gesture. But that was not inexcusable; for she had always thought he was Henry VIII, and she did not approve of him.

At half-past nine Dulcie took a last look at the pictures on the dresser, turned out the light, and skipped into bed. It's an awful thing to go to bed with a good-night look at General Kitchener, William Muldoon, the Duchess of Marlborough, and Benvenuto Cellini.

This story really doesn't get anywhere at all. The rest of it comes later—sometime when Piggy asks Dulcie again to dine with him, and she is feeling lonelier than usual, and General Kitchener happens to be looking the other way; and then—

As I said before, I dreamed that I was standing near a crowd of prosperous-looking angels, and a policeman took me by the wing and asked if I belonged with them.

"Who are they?" I asked.

"Why," said he, "they are the men who hired workinggirls, and paid 'em five or six dollars a week to live on. Are you one of the bunch?"

"Not on your immortality," said I. "I'm only the fellow that set fire to an orphan asylum, and murdered a blind man for his pennies."

THE GIFT OF THE MAGI

From The Four Million. Copyright, 1906, by Doubleday, Page and Company. By permission. First published in The World, New York, December 10, 1905.

ONE dollar and eighty-seven cents. That was all. And sixty cents of it was in pennies. Pennies saved one and two at a time by bulldozing the grocer and the vegetable man and the butcher until one's cheeks burned with the silent imputation of parsimony that such close dealing implied. Three times Della counted it. One dollar and eighty-seven cents. And the next day would be Christmas.

There was clearly nothing to do but flop down on the shabby little couch and howl. So Della did it. Which instigates the moral reflection that life is made up of sobs, sniffles, and smiles, with sniffles predominating.

While the mistress of the home is gradually subsiding from the first stage to the second, take a look at the home.

A furnished flat at $8 per week. It did not exactly beggar description, but it certainly had that word on the lookout for the mendicancy squad.

In the vestibule below was a letter-box into which no letter would go, and an electric button from which no mortal finger could coax a ring. Also appertaining thereunto was a card bearing the name "Mr. James Dillingham Young."

The "Dillingham" had been flung to the breeze during a former period of prosperity when its possessor was being paid $30 per week. Now, when the income was shrunk to $20, the letters of "Dillingham" looked blurred, as though they were thinking seriously of contracting to a modest and unassuming D. But whenever Mr. James Dillingham Young came home and reached his flat above he was called "Jim" and greatly hugged by Mrs. James Dillingham Young, already introduced to you as Della. Which is all very good.

Della finished her cry and attended to her cheeks with the powder rag. She stood by the window and looked out dully at a grey cat walking a grey fence in a grey backyard. To-morrow would be Christmas Day, and she had only $1.87 with which to buy Jim a present. She had been saving every penny she could for months, with this result. Twenty dollars a week doesn't go far. Expenses had been greater than she had calculated. They always are. Only $1.87 to buy a present for Jim. Her Jim. Many a happy hour she had spent planning for something nice for him. Something fine and rare and sterling—something just a little bit near to being worthy of the honour of being owned by Jim.

There was a pier-glass between the windows of the room. Perhaps you have seen a pier-glass in an $8 flat. A very thin and very agile person may, by observing his reflection in a rapid sequence of longitudinal strips, obtain a fairly accurate conception of his looks. Della, being slender, had mastered the art.

Suddenly she whirled from the window and stood before the glass. Her eyes were shining brilliantly, but her face had lost its colour within twenty seconds. Rapidly she pulled down her hair and let it fall to its full length.

Now, there were two possessions of the James Dillingham Youngs in which they both took a mighty pride. One was Jim's gold watch that had been his father's and his grandfather's. The other was Della's hair. Had the Queen of Sheba lived in the flat across the airshaft, Della would have let her hair hang out the window some day to dry just to depreciate Her Majesty's jewels and gifts. Had King Solomon been the janitor, with all his treasures piled up in the basement, Jim would have pulled out his watch every time he passed, just to see him pluck at his beard from envy.

So now Della's beautiful hair fell about her, rippling and shining like a cascade of brown waters. It reached below her knee and made itself almost a garment for her. And then she did it up again nervously and quickly. Once she faltered for a minute and stood still while a tear or two splashed on the worn red carpet.

On went her old brown jacket; on went her old brown hat. With a whirl of skirts and with the brilliant sparkle still in her eyes, she fluttered out the door and down the stairs to the street.

Where she stopped the sign read: "Mme. Sofronie. Hair Goods of All Kinds." One flight up Della ran, and collected herself, panting. Madame, large, too white, chilly, hardly looked the "Sofronie."

"Will you buy my hair?" asked Della.

"I buy hair," said Madame. "Take yer hat off and let's have a sight at the looks of it."

Down rippled the brown cascade.

"Twenty dollars," said Madame, lifting the mass with a practiced hand.

"Give it to me quick," said Della.

Oh, and the next two hours tripped by on rosy wings. Forget the hashed metaphor. She was ransacking the stores for Jim's present.

She found it at last. It surely had been made for Jim and no one else. There was no other like it in any of the stores, and she had turned all of them inside out. It was a platinum fob chain simple and chaste in design, properly proclaiming its value by substance alone and not by meretricious ornamentation—as all good things should do. It was even worthy of The Watch. As soon as she saw it she knew that it must be Jim's. It was like him. Quietness and value—the description applied to both. Twenty-one dollars they took from her for it, and she hurried home with the 87 cents. With that chain on his watch Jim might be properly anxious about the time in any company. Grand as the watch was, he sometimes looked at it on the sly on account of the old leather strap that he used in place of a chain.

When Della reached home her intoxication gave way a little to prudence and reason. She got out her curling irons and lighted the gas and went to work repairing the ravages made by generosity added to love. Which is always a tremendous task, dear friends—a mammoth task.

Within forty minutes her head was covered with tiny, close-lying curls that made her look wonderfully like a truant schoolboy. She looked at her reflection in the mirror long, carefully, and critically.

"If Jim doesn't kill me," she said to herself, "before he takes a second look at me, he'll say I look like a Coney Island chorus girl. But what could I do—oh! what could I do with a dollar and eighty-seven cents?"

At 7 o'clock the coffee was made and the frying-pan was on the back of the stove hot and ready to cook the chops.

Jim was never late. Della doubled the fob chain in her hand and sat on the corner of the table near the door that he always entered. Then she heard his step on the stair away down on the first flight, and she turned white for just a moment. She had a habit of saying little silent prayers about the simplest everyday things, and now she whispered: "Please God, make him think I am still pretty."

The door opened and Jim stepped in and closed it. He looked thin and very serious. Poor fellow, he was only twenty-two—and to be burdened with a family! He needed a new overcoat and he was without gloves.

Jim stopped inside the door, as immovable as a setter at the scent of quail. His eyes were fixed upon Della, and there was an expression in them that she could not read, and it terrified her. It was not anger, nor surprise, nor disapproval, nor horror, nor any of the sentiments that she had been prepared for. He simply stared at her fixedly with that peculiar expression on his face.

Della wriggled off the table and went for him.

"Jim, darling," she cried, "don't look at me that way. I had my hair cut off and sold it because I couldn't have lived through Christmas without giving you a present. It'll grow out again—you won't mind, will you? I just had to do it. My hair grows awfully fast. Say 'Merry Christmas!' Jim, and let's be happy. You don't know what a nice—what a beautiful, nice gift I've got for you."

"You've cut off your hair?" asked Jim, laboriously, as if he had not arrived at that patent fact yet even after the hardest mental labour.

"Cut it off and sold it," said Della. "Don't you like me just as well, anyhow? I'm me without my hair, ain't I?"

Jim looked about the room curiously.

"You say your hair is gone?" he said, with an air almost of idiocy.

"You needn't look for it," said Della. "It's sold, I tell you—sold and gone, too. It's Christmas Eve, boy. Be good to me, for it went for you. Maybe the hairs of my head were numbered," she went on with a sudden serious sweetness, "but nobody could ever count my love for you. Shall I put the chops on, Jim?"

Out of his trance Jim seemed quickly to wake. He enfolded his Della. For ten seconds let us regard with discreet scrutiny some inconsequential object in the other direction. Eight dollars a week or a million a year—what is the difference? A mathematician or a wit would give you the wrong answer. The magi brought valuable gifts, but that was not among them. This dark assertion will be illuminated later on.

Jim drew a package from his overcoat pocket and threw it upon the table.

"Don't make any mistake, Dell," he said, "about me. I don't think there's anything in the way of a haircut or a shave or a shampoo that could make me like my girl any less. But if you'll unwrap that package you may see why you had me going a while at first."

White fingers and nimble tore at the string and paper. And then an ecstatic scream of joy; and then, alas! a quick feminine change to hysterical tears and wails, necessitating the immediate employment of all the comforting powers of the lord of the flat.

For there lay The Combs—the set of combs, side and back, that Della had worshipped for long in a Broadway window. Beautiful combs, pure tortoise shell, with jeweled rims—just the shade to wear in the beautiful vanished hair. They were expensive combs, she knew, and her heart had simply craved and yearned over them without the least hope of possession. And now, they were hers, but the tresses that should have adorned the coveted adornments were gone.

But she hugged them to her bosom, and at length she was able to look up with dim eyes and a smile and say: "My hair grows so fast, Jim!"

And then Della leaped up like a little singed cat and cried, "Oh, oh!"

Jim had not yet seen his beautiful present. She held it out to him eagerly upon her open palm. The dull precious metal seemed to flash with a reflection of her bright and ardent spirit.

"Isn't it a dandy, Jim? I hunted all over town to find it. You'll have to look at the time a hundred times a day now. Give me your watch. I want to see how it looks on it."

Instead of obeying, Jim tumbled down on the couch and put his hands under the back of his head and smiled.

"Dell," said he, "let's put our Christmas presents away and keep 'em a while. They're too nice to use just at present. I sold the watch to get the money to buy your combs. And now suppose you put the chops on."

The magi, as you know, were wise men—wonderfully wise men—who brought gifts to the Babe in the manger. They invented the art of giving Christmas presents. Being wise, their gifts were no doubt wise ones, possibly bearing the privilege of exchange in case of duplication. And here I have lamely related to you the uneventful chronicle of two foolish children in a flat who most unwisely sacrificed for each other the greatest treasures of their house. But in a last word to the wise of these days let it be said that of all who give gifts these two were the wisest. Of all who give and receive gifts, such as they are wisest. Everywhere they are wisest. They are the magi.

PATRICK HENRY

FREDERICK WILMER SIMS

BORN of Scotch-Irish descent (Scotch through his father, John Henry, a Scotch emigrant from Aberdeen, "of a very liberal and extensive education," and Welsh through his mother, the widow Syme, née Sarah Winston, daughter of Isaac Winston, a Welsh emigrant), Patrick Henry was fortunate in his birth. Neither of his parents belonged to the aristocracy of Virginia, but to the middle class; identified in thought, habits and mode of life with the great body of the people, fast growing into strength and importance at this time, not only in Virginia but throughout the extent of the colonies—especially in the newer settled portions of the country, toward the frontier, where the constant efforts to subdue Nature and the savage produced a hardy race of freemen, disdaining artificial restraints of every kind, whether in social life, in the affairs of government or of religion. And by heredity the blood in his veins flowed from who knows what ancient Highland seer, or Welsh minstrel, which gave him, perchance, that rhapsody of the imagination and that gift of divination and of foresight of "coming events" which seemed inspired.

Until the age of ten years he attended a common English school near "Mount Brilliant," his second home in Hanover County, to which his parents had removed from his birthplace. Here he learned to read and write and acquired a little knowledge of arithmetic. Thereafter his father was his only teacher, by whom he was well grounded in Latin, mathematics, history, both ancient and modern, and given a "smattering of the Greek." At the age of fifteen his school life ceased; he was, however, devoted to reading, and while not an extensive reader at any time, had the faculty of retaining all he read.

At this time he began his business life as a clerk in a country store in Hanover (1752), and during 1753 he and his brother William conducted a store in the same county as partners. The business was not found profitable, because of too much credit extended to their customers, and it was closed. Patrick was married, when but little over eighteen years old, to Sarah Shelton, daughter of John Shelton, of the Forks of Hanover, and after trying in vain to run a farm and a country store at the same time—neither proving successful—he began to read law, and soon afterward sold out his store, though continuing to work his farm.

After reading 'Coke on Littleton' and a digest of the Virginia Acts several months, Patrick Henry rode to Williamsburg in his rustic garb, in the spring of 1760, to appear before the board of examiners as an applicant for a license to practice law. Only one of the board, the accomplished Peyton Randolph, afterwards Attorney-general, seems to have examined him at all. His questions soon exposed the candidate's deficiency in municipal law, but disclosed that he was well grounded in the common law, the laws of Nature and of nations, and with respect to the policy of the feudal system and in general history, "which last was found to be his stronghold."

There was yet a little further time of preparation. He began the practice of law in the fall of 1760, and for three years lived with his wife's father, who then kept the tavern at Hanover Court House. While for three years he did not lack for practice in Hanover and Louisa counties, they were small cases which did not occupy all of his time. He assisted Mr. Shelton at odd times as host, and mingled with the people on the Court green and in their home lives, as keenly observant as ever; often reading, as his habit was, doubtless now from law books; and frequently studying the great book of Nature, with dog and gun, in the brown fields and great forests.

On December 1, 1763, he appeared for the defendant in the famous Parsons' cause. His father sat in the chair as presiding justice. His appearance on that occasion has been described as follows:

"He rose very awkwardly and faltered much in his exordium. The people hung their heads at so unpromising a commencement; the clergy were observed to exchange sly looks at each other, and his father is described as having almost sunk with confusion from his seat; but these feelings were of short duration, and soon gave place to others of a very different character. Now were those wonderful faculties which he possessed for the first time developed, and now was witnessed that mysterious and almost supernatural transformation of appearance which the fire of his own eloquence never failed to work in him. For as his mind rolled along, and began to glow from its own action, all the exuviæ of the clown seemed to shed themselves spontaneously. His attitude, by degrees, became erect and lofty; the spirit of his genius awakened all his features; his countenance shone with a nobleness and grandeur which it had never before exhibited. There was a lightning in his eyes which seemed to rivet the spectator; his action became bold and commanding; and in the tones of his voice, but more especially in his emphasis, there was a peculiar charm, a magic, of which anyone who ever heard him will speak, as soon as he is named, but of which no one can give any adequate description. They can only say that it struck upon the ear and upon the heart in a manner which language cannot tell. Add to all these his wonder-working fancy, and the peculiar phraseology in which he clothed his images; for he painted to the heart with a force that almost petrified it. In the language of those who heard him on this occasion, 'he made their blood run cold, and their hair to rise on end.'"

Then followed a large increase of legal practice, and on the first day of its session in the spring of 1765 the House of Burgesses elected Mr. Henry as a delegate from Louisa County to fill a vacancy caused by the resignation of William Johnson, the former delegate, he having accepted the office of coroner. Mr. Henry took his seat in the House of Burgesses May 20, 1765, and was at once placed on the Committee of Courts of Justice. Three days after taking his seat he made his maiden legislative speech on the bill, fostered by Mr. Robinson, the Speaker and Treasurer, with personal motives un!:nown to Mr. Henry at the time, to establish a public loan office.

In opposition to this bill "he displayed not only his great powers of eloquence, but his courage in maintaining his convictions of public duty against the united efforts of the aristocratic leaders of the body. He at once threw himself athwart their path and aroused their enmity, which was none the less bitter because mixed with dread." On May 29, 1765, his twenty-ninth birthday, Mr. Henry offered his famous resolutions on the Stamp Act. It was in this debate that Mr. Henry made the famous declaration "in voice and gesture that startled the House":

"... Tarquin and Cæsar had each his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third"— "Treason! Treason!" shouted the Speaker. "Treason! Treason!" echoed from every part of the House. Without faltering for an instant, but rising to a loftier attitude and fixing on the Speaker an eye that seemed to flash fire, Mr. Henry added, with the most thrilling emphasis—"may profit by their example! If this be treason, make the most of it."

Mr. Henry himself considered this the most important concern of his life, and preserved the evidence of this alone from among his almost innumerable actions for the public weal.

Mr. Henry took the fearless stand that taxation without representation was tyranny and should be resisted, and thus planted the standard around which all who desired to be free might rally, and soon, in America, did rally. And this became the great American doctrine, the chief basis for the War of the Revolution and the achievement of the independence of the American Colonies.

A notable achievement indeed; and the winner of it had won for himself a name among the immortals, even had he then ceased all labor for the public good!

From 1765 to 1794—a period of thirty years—Mr. Henry, with the exception of the five years of his governorship, was continuously a member of Burgesses and of the House of Delegates of the Virginia Assembly, besides holding many other important civil and military offices. He declined in three successive years (1794-1796) the offices of United States Senator, Secretary of State, Chief Justice of the United States, and Governor of Virginia—the latter offered him the seventh time. He was again elected to the Virginia Assembly in 1799, following his last and famous public appearance, at Charlotte Court House, March 4, 1799.

The limited space allotted to this sketch will not permit of noticing many interesting details of Mr. Henry's life, and we can therefore refer but briefly to a few of its more salient features.

Mr. Henry's greatest political speech was delivered in the second Revolutionary Convention of Virginia, in old St. John's Church, Richmond, on Thursday, March 23, 1775, on the resolutions moved by him for arming the Colony. His genius was never more resplendent; and the clarion call to arms was heard by all America.

In his exordium he said:

"Mr. President, it is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth, and listen to the song of that syren, till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not the things which so nearly concern our temporal salvation? For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth; to know the worst, and provide for it.

* * * * * *

"In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be free—if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending—if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained—we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight!! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

* * * * * *

"Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible to any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. . . Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged; their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston! The war is inevitable—and let it come!!! I repeat it, sir, let it come!!!"

He then, in a magnificent peroration, which has never yet been equaled, exclaimed:

"It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun! The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we idle here? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it. Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

As Governor of Virginia, Mr. Henry performed Herculean labora in support of the patriot cause, and in the protection of the western frontiers of Virginia from British and savage attack. His connection with the "winning of the West," in the Northwest Territory—the humane, yet far-sighted statesmanship displayed—was in itself sufficient to have given him imperishable fame.

With the session of the Virginia Assembly of 1790 Mr. Henry closed his long and illustrious public career, declining reëlection the next spring. He soon regained his position of preëminence at the bar of his native State. His famous argument in the British debts case was his greatest effort as a lawyer. John Randolph of Roanoke was present at the argument of this celebrated case, and afterward described the scene:

"Mr. Henry presented the appearance of an old man, very much wrapped up, and resting his head on the bar. As he arose he began to complain that it was too great a hardship to put the laboring oar in the hands of a decrepit old man, trembling, with one foot in the grave, weak in his best days, and far inferior to the able associates by him."

Randolph said, although he knew it was all put on, still such was the power of his manner and voice that he would in a moment forget and find himself enraged with the Court for their cruelty. He then gave a brilliant outline of Mr. Henry's progress in his argument, and compared him to the practicing of a race-horse, sometimes displaying his whole power and speed for a few laps, and then slacking up again. At last, Randolph said, he got up to full speed, and took a rapid view of what England had done when she had been successful in arms, and what would have been our fate, had we been unsuccessful. The color began to come and go in the face of the Chief Justice, while Iredell sat with his eyes and mouth stretched open in perfect wonder. Finally Henry arrived at his utmost height and grandeur. He raised his hands in one of his grand and solemn pauses. Randolph said his hands seemed to cover the whole house. There was a tumultuous applause, and Judge Iredell exclaimed: "Gracious God! He is an orator indeed!"

In his retirement Mr. Henry matured and had leisure to make use of that capacity for business success which he always possessed (given the opportunity), and he amassed a considerable fortune for that day. The charge that Mr. Henry was guilty of improper conduct in the Yazoo speculation has been utterly refuted by investigation, and likewise has every other act of his private life been proven to have been clean and above reproach. He continued to take an active interest in political affairs, both state and national. It has been charged that he changed his political principles in his old age; but there is no sufficient evidence of this. It is true that the spread of infidelity, the excesses of the French Revolution, and the intemperance of the Republicans of the day did not meet with the approval of Mr. Henry. The abuse of Mr. Washington was most painful to him, and he did not hesitate to express his condemnation of it, and of the action of Mr. Madison and other Republican leaders.

Mr. Henry died on June 6, 1799—just past the age of sixty-three. His body was laid to rest in the quiet graveyard at Red Hill, at the foot of the garden. A plain marble slab covers his grave, on which are inscribed his name, the dates of his birth and death, and the words: "His fame is his best epitaph,"

In taking a survey of Patrick Henry's life as a whole, it may perhaps be thus summarized:

His industry, his business capacity, his close application to the discharge of prosaic duties, from early youth throughout life, have been much underrated. His single recreation, that of outdoor sports, which the press of public and professional duties compelled him to abandon in later life, has been greatly magnified. There is no evidence that for this he ever neglected any duty or shirked any labor, however arduous. It would be difficult, indeed, in casting up the sum of his life's efforts, to compute which contributed more to his success, the transcendence of his genius as an orator or his actual accomplishments by hard work; certain it is that without the latter he would not have succeeded. So that, after all, his life furnishes no exception to the definition that "genius is an infinite capacity for work."

It is true that the impartial critic must point out that Mr. Henry's mind was not methodical in its operation; while he could be logical in his deductions, it was the complaint and the despair of his opponents in debate that he would not be so. His grasp was of the whole. His mind rebelled against a minute, microscopic examination of any subject. He felt that the force of his presentation to his auditors would be thereby weakened and destroyed. And when we consider the nature of his subjects and the auditors which his age furnished him, we are convinced that he was right.

The marvelous impression made on his contemporaries by his oratory seems to have been due to his entire sincerity and identity of feeling with the great body of the people, whose life he had led and was still leading; in whose labors and hardships he had a part; to his great ability to reason from fundamental principles and apply them to the question at issue; to voice, indeed, the inward convictions and the very thoughts (perchance as yet but imperfectly formed) of the great body of his hearers, but in a manner most superb, with action the most striking and ever absolutely true to Nature, impelled by the very fulness of his impassioned feeling and utterance, and in perfect harmony with his thought; and to his matchless tones, suited to every emotion, whether of humor, of pity, of terror, or of command.

With respect to his place in the legal profession, the impartial student of his life is compelled to conclude that he was never an accomplished lawyer such as were a number of his contemporaries. Here, too, his mind could not be "cabined, cribbed, confined," by the technical thought and narrow deductions of a legal argument, based upon citation of authority and of precedent. With irresistible force he burst asunder all such feeble restraints, and appealed to great fundamental principles underlying all law and all precedent, antedating and superseding them all. Nor did he disdain to appeal to the elemental emotions and passions to sustain his position, with an incarnation of emotion and passion that was irresistible.

As a man, Patrick Henry lived a pure and blameless life; dominated by high ideals, but using practical common-sense means to accomplish results; a life filled throughout with unselfish service in the faithful discharge of his duty to his God, his neighbor and himself. Ending his days upon earth at the comparatively early age of sixty-three, few men have been able to look back, as he did, upon so little of time idly wasted or misspent, and perhaps none upon a life-work of greater or more lasting benefit to mankind.

PATRICK HENRY TO COLONEL GEORGE ROGERS CLARK

Dec. 12, 1778.

You are to retain the Command of the troops now at the several posts in the county of Illinois and on the Wabash, which fall within the limits of the County now erected and called Illinois County, which troops marched out with, and have been embodied by you. You are also to take the Command of five other Companies, raised under the act of Assembly which I send herewith, and which if completed, as I hope they will be speedily, will have orders to join you without loss of time, and are likewise to be under your command.

With your whole force you are to protect the Inhabitants of the County, &, as occasions may serve, annoy the enemy.

It is thought that the Indian Nations may be overawed and inclined to peace with us, by the Adoption of proper measures with you. Or, if that can not be effected, that such of them as send out parties towards our Frontiers on this side of the Ohio, may be chastised by detachments from your quarter. For this purpose it will behoove you to watch their motions, and to consider, that one great advantage expected from your situation is to prevent the Indians from warring on this side of Ohio.

In order more effectually to prevent this, you are to establish such posts in different parts of the Country as you judge best for your troops to occupy.

I consider your further success as depending upon the goodwill and friendship of the Frenchmen and Indians who inhabit your part of the Commonwealth. With their concurrence great things may be accomplished. But their animosity will spoil the fair prospect which your past successes have opened. You will therefore spare no pains to conciliate the affections of the French and Indians. Let them see and feel the advantage of being fellow citizens and freemen. Guard most carefully against every infringement of their property, particularly with respect to land, as our enemies have alarmed them as to that. Strict, and even severe, discipline with your soldiers may be essential, to preserve from injury those whom they were sent to protect and conciliate. This is a great and capital matter, and I confide that you will never lose sight of it, or suffer your troops to injure any person without feeling the punishment due to the offence. The honor and interest of the state are deeply concerned in this, and the attachment of the French and Indians depends upon a due observance of it.

John Todd Esquire being appointed County Lieutenant according to law, during pleasure, with ample powers chiefly confined to the Civil Department, will have directions to act in concert with you wherever it can be done. On your part, you will omit no opportunity to give him the necessary cooperation of the troops, where the case necessarily requires it. Much will depend upon the mutual assistance you may occasionally afford each other in your respective departments, and I trust that a sincere cordiality will subsist between you. The contrary will prove highly detrimental. Some measures will be fallen on for carrying on a trade to supply goods for the inhabitants of your County. You will afford the agents such aid or protection from time to time as affairs require, and your circumstances will permit.

I send you forthwith some copies of the act of Government and Bill of Rights, together with the French alliance. These will serve to show our new friends the ground upon which they are to stand, and the support to be expected from their countrymen of France. Equal liberty and happiness are the objects to a participation of which we invite them.

Upon a fair presumption that the people about Detroit have similar inclinations with those at Illinois and Wabash, I think it possible that they may be brought to expel their British Masters, and become fellow citizens of a free State. I recommend this to your serious consideration, and to consult with some confidential persons on the subject. Perhaps Mr. Gibault, the Priest (to whom this country owes many thanks for his zeal and services), may promote this affair. But I refer it to you to select the proper persons to advise with and to act as occasion offers. But you are to push at any favorable occurrences which Fortune may present to you. For our peace and safety are not secure while the enemy are so near as Detroit.

I wish you to testify to all the subjects of Spain upon every occasion, the high regard and sincere friendship of this Commonwealth towards them. And I hope it will soon be manifest, that mutual advantages will derive from the Neighborhood of the Virginias and the subjects of his Catholic Majesty. I must observe to you that your situation is critical.

Far detached from the body of your country, placed among French, Spaniards, and Indian Nations, strangers to our people, anxiously watching your actions and behavior, and ready to receive impressions favorable, or not so, of our Commonwealth and its Government, which impressions will be hard to remove, and will produce lasting good or ill effects to your country. These considerations will make you cautious and circumspect. I feel the delicacy and difficulty of your situation, but I doubt not your virtue will accomplish the arduous work with honor to yourself, and advantage to the Commonwealth. The advice and assistance of discreet good men will be highly necessary. For at the distance of your country, I cannot be consulted. General discretionary powers therefore are given you, to act for the best in all cases where those instructions are silent and the law has made no provision.

I desire your particular attention to Mrs. Rocheblave and her children and that you suffer them to want for nothing. Let Mr. Rocheblave's property, which was taken, be restored to his lady so far as it can be done. You have the sum of sixty pounds sent for her use, in case you can't find her husband's effects to restore.

Prudence requires that provisions be laid in to subsist the Troops you have, & those to be expected to arrive with you. Colonel Bowman has contracted to deliver 35,000 lbs. Bear Bacon at Kentucky. But bread must be had at Illinois. You will provide it, if possible, before the arrival of the Troops, or the necessity to buy it becomes general known, as perhaps advantages may be taken by raising the price. Lay up also a good stock of powder and Lead, etc.

There is a cargo of goods at a Spanish post near you, belonging either to the Continent or this state. Rather than let your Troops be naked you are to take a supply for them out of these goods. But this is not to be done but in case of absolute necessity. Let an exact account be kept of what is used and let me receive it.

In your negotiations or treatys with the Indians, you will be assisted by Mr. Todd. Let the treatys be confined to the subject of amity and peace with our people, and not to touch the subject of lands. You may accept of any services they offer for expelling the English from Detroit or elsewhere. In case you find presents to the savages necessary, make them sparingly as possible, letting them know our stock of goods is small at present, but by means of our trade with the French and other nations, we expect plenty of Goods before it is long.

Lieutenant Colonel Montgomery will convey to you ten thousand pounds for payment of the troops, and for other matters requiring money. In the distribution of the money you will be careful to keep exact accounts from time to time, and take security where it is proper.

Yours, etc.,
Col. Geo. Rogers Clark, P. Henry.
Commander-in-Chief of the Virginia Troops,
In the County of Illinois.

PATRICK HENRY TO THE DELEGATES FROM VIRGINIA IN CONGRESS

VIRGINIA COUNCIL CHAMBERS, Aug. 12, 1785.

Gentlemen: On considering the disadvantage suffered by this state on account of the unsettled condition of our continental account, I have thought it necessary to enquire into the business, and if possible to remove the obstacles that have prevented the final accomplishment of it.

In order to give you some general knowledge on the subject, I herewith send you a letter from Mr. Solicitor Woods, by which you will perceive his embarrassments and some of those of the Continental agent. How they are to be removed, Congress alone can determine. It is true perhaps that in many instances we may have departed from system. But suppose exact system had been preserved, and proper vouchers kept for every article previous to Arnold's visit in 1781, we know these vouchers would have been lost with the other public Archives and papers at the seat of government which the chance of war threw into the hands of the enemy. The truth is that if the destruction of our public papers had not happened, but little of the present difficulty would have arisen, and I trust it is not possible for Congress to decide that no abatement is to be made in the rigorous demand of vouchers of which we are deprived by coup de main of the enemy. In the case of an individual this would never be practised, and wherefore it ought, or can, in a case circumstanced as the present, no good reason can be assigned. It is well known that the great burden of the war towards its later stages fell on the Southern States, and among these upon Virginia as the most considerable. The many and great efforts made by our country both to the South and West, cannot be forgot and need not be repeated by me. Besides these it is well known that on account of the accessible situation of our country, we were liable to attacks so sudden as to prevent the observance of that system of accounting for expenses, which would have taken place had these attacks been made in a measure less sudden and unexpected. And further I beg leave to observe, that in a state of exhaustion of this country in the time succeeding the loss of our papers, it was absolutely necessary to carry on the military operations by impressments, and in these you can easily see it is often times impossible to produce such vouchers as will discriminate the articles taken to be for Continental use. I do not make these observations with a view to obtain allowance of our claims as if they were altogether unsupported by proper vouchers, for it will be seen that in many instances such are ready to be produced. But I urge that from the nature of the case exactness ought not to be expected. Although it may be said truly, that in the beginning of the war expenses were incurred here in building galleys, etc. for purposes not Continental, yet it must be admitted that in the more advanced periods of the contest, all our operations were directly aimed at the common enemy, whose efforts called for increasing opposition and expense.

I take the liberty just to mention that if no better mode of reckoning can be found, recourse may be had to certain historical facts, by which it will appear that at sundry times this country was attacked by numerous bodies of Indians, against whom great numbers of militia were called out; that at other times we were invaded by British Troops, to repel whom, we were obliged to raise, arm and embody great numbers of our people; that over and above our Continental requisition, frequent demands were made on the state for occasional aids, which were always complied with, to the utmost of our abilities. Explanations and detail can be afforded in most instances, but I only sketch out in general some such plan of settlement, which you will urge or not according to your better judgment and understanding of the matter.

From a view of the whole affair, I am led to wish that Congress will take up our claims, upon a footing more liberal than that to which their present commissioners are restricted.

To refuse this is to reject our claims to such an extent as will greatly injure Virginia. It is not for me to describe the powers with which the Continental commissioners ought to be invested. The wisdom of Congress, while guarding against injustice to the United States, will easily suggest the means of doing justice to the exertions of a state, that on all occasions gave proofs of the most zealous attachment to the general good.

I doubt not you will take the earliest opportunity of bringing this affair before Congress, in order that the result may be laid before the Assembly at the first of their meeting.

I am, etc.,

P. HENRY.

To the Honorable Delegates from Virginia in Congress.

SPEECH ON THE PRESENT UNEASINESS

Delivered in the Virginia Convention, June 4, 1788.

THE public mind, as well as my own, is extremely uneasy at the proposed change of government. Give me leave to form one of the number of those who wish to be thoroughly acquainted with the reasons of this perilous and uneasy situation—and why we are brought hither to decide on this great national question. I consider myself as the servant of the people of this commonwealth, as a sentinel over their rights. liberty and happiness. I represent their feelings when I say. that they are exceedingly uneasy, being brought from that state of full security which they enjoyed, to the present delusive appearance of things. A year ago the minds of our citizens were at perfect repose. Before the meeting of the late Federal convention at Philadelphia, a general peace, and an universal tranquillity prevailed in this country-but since that period they are exceedingly uneasy and disquieted. When I wished for an appointment to this convention, my mind was extremely agitated for the situation of public affairs. I conceived the republic to be in extreme danger. If our situation be thus uneasy, whence has arisen this fearful jeopardy? It arises from this fatal system—it arises from a proposal to change our government—a proposal that goes to the utter annihilation of the most solemn engagements of the states, a proposal of establishing nine states into a confederacy to the eventual exclusion of four states. It goes to the annihilation of those solemn treaties we have formed with foreign nations. The present circumstances of France, the good offices rendered us by that kingdom, require our most faithful and most punctual adherence to our treaty with her. We are in alliance with the Spaniards, the Dutch, the Prussians; those treaties bound us as thirteen states, confederated together. Yet here is a proposal to sever that confederacy. Is it possible that we shall abandon all our treaties and national engagements?—And for what? I expected to have heard the reasons of an event so unexpected to my mind and to many others. Was our civil polity, or public justice, endangered or sapped? Was the real existence of the country threatened—or was this preceded by a mournful progression of events? This proposal of altering our Federal government is of a most alarming nature: make the best of this new government—say it is composed by anything but inspiration-you ought to be extremely cautious, watchful, jealous of your liberty; for instead of securing your rights, you may lose them forever. If a wrong step be now made, the republic may be lost forever. If this new government will not come up to the expectation of the people, and they should be disappointed—their liberty will be lost, and tyranny must and will arise. I repeat it again, and I beg gentlemen to consider, that a wrong step made now will plunge us into misery, and our republic will be lost. It will be necessary for this convention to have a faithful historical detail of the facts that preceded the session of the Federal convention, and the reasons that actuated its members in proposing an entire alteration of government—and to demonstrate the dangers that awaited us; if they were of such awful magnitude as to warrant a proposal so extremely perilous as this, I must assert that this convention has an absolute right to a thorough discovery of every circumstance relative to this great event. And here I would make this enquiry of those worthy characters who composed a part of the late Federal convention. I am sure they were fully impressed with the necessity of forming a great consolidated government, instead of a confederation. That this is a consolidated government is demonstrably clear; and the danger of such a government is, to my mind, very striking. I have the highest veneration for those gentlemen; but, sir, give me leave to demand, what right had they to say, We, the People? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask, who authorized them to speak the language of We, the People, instead of We, the States? States are the characteristics and soul of a confederation. If the states be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated national government of the people of all the states. I have the highest respect for those gentlemen who formed the convention, and were some of them not here, I would express some testimonial of esteem for them. America had on a former occasion put the utmost confidence in them, a confidence which was well placed; and I am sure, sir, I would give up anything to them; I would cheerfully confide in them as my representatives. But, sir, on this great occasion, I would demand the cause of their conduct. Even from that illustrious man, who saved us by his valor, I would have a reason for his conduct that liberty which he has given us by his valor, tells me to ask this reason—and sure I am, were he here, he would give us that reason; but there are other gentlemen here, who can give us that information. The people gave them no power to use their name. That they exceeded their power is perfectly clear. It is not mere curiosity that actuates me, I wish to hear the real, actual, existing danger, which should lead us to take those steps so dangerous in my conception. Disorders have arisen in other parts of America, but here, sir, no dangers, no insurrection, nor tumult, has happened—everything has been calm and tranquil. But notwithstanding this, we are wandering on the great ocean of human affairs. I see no landmark to guide us. We are running we know not whither. Difference in opinion has gone to a degree of inflammatory resentment in different parts of the country—which has been occasioned by this perilous innovation. The Federal convention ought to have amended the old system—for this purpose they were solely delegated: the object of their mission extended to no other consideration. You must therefore forgive the solicitation of one unworthy member to know what danger could have arisen under the present confederation, and what are the causes of this proposal to change our government.

SPEECH ON RESPONSIBILITY

Delivered in the Virginia Convention, June 14, 1788.

It is now confessed that this is a National Government. There is not a single federal feature in it. It has been alleged within these walls during the debates, to be national and federal, as it suited the arguments of the gentlemen. But now when we have heard the definition of it, it is purely national. The honorable member is pleased to say that the sword and purse included everything of consequence; and shall we trust them out of their hands without checks and barriers? The sword and purse are essentially necessary for the government. Every essential requisite must be in Congress. Where are the purse and sword of Virginia? They must go to Congress. What is become of your country? The Virginian government is but a name. It clearly results from his last argument that we are to be consolidated. We should be thought unwise indeed to keep two hundred legislators in Virginia when the government is in fact gone to Philadelphia or New York. We are as a State to form no part of the government. Where are your checks? The most essential objects of government are to be administered by Congress. How then can the State governments be any check upon them? If we are to be a republican government it will be consolidated, not confederated.

The means, says the gentleman, must be commensurate to the end. How does this apply? All things in common are left with this government. There being an infinitude in the government, there must be an infinitude of means to carry it on. This is a sort of mathematical government that may appear well on paper, but cannot sustain examination, or be safely reduced to practice. The delegation of power to an adequate number of representatives, and an unimpeded reversion of it back to the people at short periods, form the principal traits of a republican government. The idea of a republican government in that paper is something superior to the poor people.

The governing persons are the servants of the people. There the servants are greater than their masters; because it includes infinitude, and infinitude excludes every idea of subordination. In this the creature has destroyed and soared above the creator. For if its powers be infinite, what rights have the people remaining? By that very argument despotism has made its way in all countries, where the people unfortunately have been enslaved by it. We are told the sword and purse are necessary for the national defence. The junction of these without limitations in the same hands, is, by logical and mathematical conclusions, the description of despotism.

The reasons adduced here to-day have long ago been advanced in favor of passive obedience and non-resistance. In 1688 the British nation expelled their monarch for attempting to trample on their liberties. The doctrine of divine right and passive obedience—said to be commanded by heaven—was inculcated by his minions and adherents. He wanted to possess, without control, the sword and the purse. The attempt cost him his crown. This government demands the same powers. I see reason to be more and more alarmed, I fear it will terminate in despotism. As to his objection of the abuse of liberty, it is denied. The political enquiries and promotions of the peasants is a happy circumstance. A foundation of knowledge is a great mark of happiness. When the spirit of enquiry after political discernment goes forth among the lowest of the people, it rejoices my heart. Why such fearful apprehensions? I defy him to show that liberty has been abused. There has been no rebellion here, though there was in Massachusetts. Tell me of any country which has been so long without a rebellion. Distresses have been patiently borne in this country which would have produced revolutions in other countries. We strained every nerve to make provision to pay off our soldiers and officers. They, though not paid and greatly distressed at the conclusion of the war, magnanimously acquiesced. The depreciation of the circulating currency very much involved many of them, and thousands of other citizens, in absolute ruin; but the same patient fortitude and forbearance marked their conduct. What would the people of England have done in such a situation? They would have resisted the government and murdered the tyrant. But in this country no abuse of power has taken place. It is only a general assertion, unsupported, which suggests the contrary. Individual licentiousness will show its baneful consequences in every country, let its government be what it may.

But the honorable gentleman says, responsibility will exist more in this than in the British Government. It exists here more in name than in anything else. I need not speak of the executive authority. But consider the two houses—the American Parliament. Are the members of the Senate responsible? They may try themselves, and if found guilty on impeachment, are to be only removed from office. In England the greatest characters are brought to the block for their sinister administration. They have a power there, not to dismiss them from office, but from life, for malpractice. The king himself cannot pardon in this case. How does it stand with respect to your lower house? You have but ten; whatever number may be there, six is a majority. Will your country afford no temptation, no money to corrupt them? Cannot six fat places be found to accommodate them? They may, after the first Congress, take any place. There will be a multiplicity of places. Suppose they corruptly obtain places. Where will you find them to punish them? At the farthest parts of the Union; in the ten miles square; or within a state where there is a stronghold. What are you to do when these men return from Philadelphia? Two things are to be done: To detect the offender and bring him to punishment. You will find it difficult to do either. In England the proceedings are openly transacted. They deliver their opinions freely and openly. They do not fear all Europe. Compare it to this. You cannot detect the guilty. The publication from time to time is merely optional in them. They may prolong the period, or suppress it altogether under pretence of its being necessary to be kept secret. The yeas and nays will avail nothing. Is the publication daily? It may be a year, or once in a century? I know this would be an unfair construction in the common concerns of life. But it would satisfy the words of the Constitution. It would be some security were it once a year, or even once in two years. When the new election comes on, unless you detect them what becomes of your responsibility? Will they discover their guilt when they wish to be reëlected? This would suppose them to be not only bad but foolish men. In pursuit of responsibility have you a right to scrutinize into the conduct of your representatives? Can any man who conceives himself injured go and demand a sight of their journals? But it will be told that I am suspicious. I am answered to every question, that they will be good men. In England they see daily what is doing in Parliament. They will hear from their Parliament in one thirty-ninth part of the time that we will hear from Congress in this scattered country. Let it be proposed in England to lay a poll-tax, or enter into any measures that will injure one part and produce emoluments to another, intelligence will fly quickly as the rays of light to the people. They will instruct their representatives to oppose it, and will petition against it, and get it prevented or redressed instantly. Impeachment follows quickly a violation of duty. Will it be so here? You must detect the offence, and punish the defaulter. How will this be done when you know not the offender, even though he had a previous design to commit the misdemeanor? Your parliament will consist of sixty-five. Your share will be ten out of the sixtyfive. Will they not take shelter by saying they were in the minority—that the men from New Hampshire and Kentucky outvoted them? Thus will responsibility, that great pillar of a free government, be taken away.

The honorable gentleman wished to try the experiment. Loving his country as he does, he would surely not wish to trust its happiness to an experiment, from which much harm, but no good may result.

I will speak another time, and will not fatigue the committee now. I think the friends of the opposition ought to make a pause here; for I can see no safety to my country if you give up this power.

CAROLINE LEE HENTZ

CAROLINE MAYS BREVARD

CAROLINE LEE WHITING, youngest child of Colonel John Whiting of the Revolutionary Army, was born at Lancaster, Massachusetts, in 1800. The Whiting family was well known in New England, and a certain ancestor, the Rev. Samuel Whiting, was prominent in early colonial times. Colonel John Whiting is said to have been a man of strong personality, cultured mind, and refined literary tastes. His traits impressed themselves strongly upon his children. He died in 1810. Three of his sons followed his profession, and they bore their part in the War of 1812. One rose, in time, to the rank of general.

We may be sure that the great events of the time had their influence upon the mind and character of the young girl, remote from scenes of strife, but with three brothers in the American Army. Letters from the young soldiers were read and read again, war became a reality, patriotism was developed, and imagination was quickened.

About this time she began writing stories, poems, and plays that delighted the members of her family and her schoolmates. Before she was twelve years old, she had written an oriental fairy drama, "Gessimentia; or, The Enchanted Ring," and "Eveline, a Tragedy." Thus, from childhood, she found pleasure in writing as the natural expression of fancy. Yet her pleasure was not all found in writing or in studying, for her life was entirely natural and healthful. We are told that she was a favorite with her companions, taking part in their games and amusements. She delighted in woodland rambles, and was influenced to an extent that she did not realize until later years, by the aspects of Nature. The peak, Wachusett, that rose in ruggedness among the mountains on the border of New Hampshire, was endowed by her with personality, and was loved by her as a friend.

On September 30, 1824, she was married to Mr. Nicholas Marcellus Hentz, a French gentleman whose father was a lawyer of Metz and a member of the French National Convention. Mr. Hentz was a man of culture and of varied talents. He was deeply interested in the study of science, especially of entomology, and was a contributor to the scientific literature of the time. His work as an instructor, however, was generally in other departments of learning. He was at the time of his marriage associated with Mr. George Bancroft in conducting a school at Round Hill, Northampton, Massachusetts. After two years spent there, he was offered the chair of Modern Languages and Belles-Lettres at Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and removed to that seat of learning.

Mrs. Hentz had never before been farther South than Boston, and found much to interest her in the new scenes. With ready tact she adapted herself to her surroundings, made friends, and identified herself with the interest of the small, cultured community of Chapel Hill. She brought with her from New England no prejudices against Southern people or Southern institutions. Though never wavering in attachment to her native section, she learned to love the South with a deep and sincere affection, so that it is not without reason that Southerners claim her as one of themselves.

In 1830 Mr. Hentz was persuaded to remove to Covington, Kentucky, to establish a school there under the joint superintendence of Mrs. Hentz and himself. It was during her residence at Covington that Mrs. Hentz produced the first dramatic effort of her mature years, "De Lara; or, The Moorish Bride; A Tragedy"; this was awarded a prize of five hundred dollars offered by Mr. Pelley of the Boston Theatre for the best original tragedy founded on the conquest of the Moors in Spain. However, Mr. Pelley, on account of business difficulties, was unable to pay the award, and he restored the copyright to the author. The tragedy, afterward published, was successfully produced at the Arch Street Theatre, Philadelphia. Mrs. Hentz was encouraged to write another play, "Lamorah," a tragedy of Indian frontier life, and a dramatic poem, "Constance of Werdenburg." But neither play nor poem was published until some years later.

After two years at Covington, they decided to go to Cincinnati and to open a school there similar to the one founded at Covington. The sojourn at Cincinnati, though but of two years' duration, was of great importance in developing the literary powers of Mrs. Hentz. She found herself in the congenial society of literary men and women, and was stimulated to further production. With the cares of motherhood and the duties of teaching, there was little time for literary work; yet she accomplished much. She wrote magazine articles, poems, and a novel 'Lovell's Folly.' She was trying her powers, but had not yet learned how to construct a plot or sustain the interest of a long story. The novel was not successful and was soon forgotten.

There was another move in 1834, this time to Florence, Alabama, where nine years were passed. Here Mrs. Hentz lived a retired life. She had now four children, the youngest an infant at the time of removal to Florence. Never before had the family demands upon her time and thought been so great, nor had her duties as a teacher been so exacting. Sometimes she would write a short poem at the suggestion of occasion. There was no other literary work during her life at Florence.

At this time Tuscaloosa was the center of much intellectual influence, and Mr. Hentz, believing it would be a favorable place for a school, removed there with his family in 1843. It was at Tuscaloosa that Mrs. Hentz wrote "Aunt Patty's Scrap Bag," during a school vacation in 1844. Here she wrote also many poems. One of her friends has described her as he first saw her at Tuscaloosa, "moving among a throng of devoted school-girls, commanding the respect, as she won the affectionate esteem, of those who were her assistants in the labors of instruction as well as those who were committed to her care; as the light and center of a united family; and only as an author when an hour found at her disposal between other duties, or snatched from the watches of the night, was pressed into service."

After two years at Tuscaloosa, another change was made and another school was opened at Tuskegee, Alabama, then a mere village, with traditions of Indian warfare still fresh in the minds of the inhabitants. Here three years were passed, during which time Mrs. Hentz published nothing. There were changes now in the family circle. The eldest daughter was married, and soon afterward the eldest son was sent away to attend a professional school.

The year 1848 was marked by removal to Columbus, Georgia, and the opening of a school at that place. During the year, 'The Mob-Cap' was published. About the beginning of the second year at Columbus Mr. Hentz's health failed entirely. Mrs. Hentz also fell ill. After her recovery she carried on the school alone for a few months, at the same time writing whenever she could find time to do so. But after the spring of 1851 she taught no more, relying entirely upon her pen for the support of the family. 'Linda' had appeared in 1850, and it was followed the next year by 'Rena; or, The Snow Bird.'

The story of 'Linda' had been told the author by the captain of a steamer on the Alabama River. He told the story well, for he had seen the Belle Creole when she was blown to pieces, and he had seen Linda just before she escaped into the woods along the river bank. At the captain's suggestion, Mrs. Hentz undertook to write the story. A daughter of Mrs. Hentz has told us how she used to sit beside her mother's writing table, "on which was always a vase of flowers," eagerly reading each page as soon as it was finished. It was Mrs. Hentz's custom, as she would finish the several chapters of her books, to read them aloud to the family, of whose full sympathy and interest she was always sure. After she gave up teaching, she set apart the morning hours for writing. Her friends, knowing this, would not interrupt her; but sometimes strangers, or persons not realizing the value of those uninterrupted hours, would call. Then Mrs. Hentz would lay aside her pen, go into the drawing room, and entertain her visitors as pleasantly as if she had no concern of greater importance than to receive morning callers. When they took their leave she would resume her work, as calm and unruffled as though she had not been disturbed.

Four years were passed at Columbus. Then, since the two elder children had made choice of Marianna, Florida, for their home, she decided to join them there. In 1852, the year of the removal to Marianna, Mrs. Hentz published two books, 'Marcus Warland; or, The Long Moss Spring,' and 'Eoline; or, Magnolia Vale.' These were written at the bedside of her husband, who was now very ill. Her literary activities at a time when the cares and anxieties of her life were so great recall the touching account Anthony Trollope gives of his mother under similar circumstances, while others rested or slept, writing the stories that were to give entertainment to many, and the means of living to those dear to her.

One book followed another in quick succession. 'Miss Thusa's Spinning Wheel,' 'Jack,' and 'Helen and Arthur' were published in 1853. 'The Planter's Northern Bride,' in two volumes, appeared the next year. In the spring of 1853 Mrs. Hentz made a visit to her old home in New England—a visit of pleasure mingled with sadness, for the years had brought many changes. After her return to Florida she began writing another novel, 'Robert Graham,' which was finished the next winter. Then she prepared for publication two volumes of earlier written tales, also a volume of dialogues, poems, and sketches that she had written from time to time for the use of her pupils. She seems to have given herself no time for rest. Yet, as ever, ready to give pleasure to others, she found time to write, for an amateur dramatic club of Quincey, a play, "Don Carlos de Castra," founded on an amusing incident in the social life of Tallahassee.

The measure of work was almost full. Her last book, and her best, according to the opinion of many, was 'Ernest Lynwood,' published in 1856. The news of the author's death was received in Boston on the day this work was issued from the press. The editor of the Boston Transcript wrote of the book as "a lingering handgrasp from one we love." Many years after, Mrs. Hentz's daughter said, "I can never read the book through without blinding tears, for I can hear through its pages the minor chords of life vibrating." Mr. Hentz died a few months after his wife. Both are buried at Marianna, one marble shaft marking their resting place.

One who knew Mrs. Hentz well has thus described her: "She is tall, graceful, dignified, with that high bred manner that ever betokens gentle blood. She has infinite talent and tact in conversation, and never speaks without awakening interest. . . . She has great enthusiasm, the enthusiasm described by Madame de Staël as 'God within us'—the love of the good, the holy, and the beautiful. She has neither pretension nor pedantry, and, although admirably accomplished, she has all the sweet simplicity of an elegant woman." Those now living who knew her have much to say of the gentleness, the cheerfulness, the charm of manner that made her a general favorite.

Her books, widely read in their day, represent the tastes and standards of the society she knew, and they picture conditions long since passed away. They are characterized by definite moral and religious teaching, are marked by purity and refinement, and leave no heart the worse for the reading. One can but feel, however, that she wrote no story so fine as that we may read between the lines of the bare record of her own life. A life of untiring industry, of cheerful devotion to duty, of willing sacrifice, and of brave facing whatever the day might bring—a life altogether sweet, and strong, and noble.

THE CRUCIAL HOUR

From 'Linda; or, the Young Pilot of the Belle Creole.'

They met face to face—these two young men—on the deck of the Belle Creole. The hot blood rushed with a crimson glow to the face of Roland, but Robert remained colourless as marble. He was conscious of a noble purpose—and magnanimity is always calm. Advancing a few steps, and holding out his hand, he said, in a low voice:

"Captain Lee, I ask forgiveness for the past, and, if possible, confidence for the future."

There was something so truthful and dignified in his manner, so simple and manly in his address, that it appealed powerfully to the ingenuous nature of Roland. He involuntarily extended his hand, but averted his face to conceal the moistened eye and quivering lip, which might expose him to a rival's pity.

"I have much that I wish to say," said Robert. "Could

I see you a few moments in private?"

Roland led the way in silence to his own apartment, where, closing the door, he turned towards Robert his agitated countenance.

"You wear the badge of mourning," said Robert. "May I ask, if it is for one we both have loved these sable weeds are worn?"

"Stop," exclaimed Roland; "my grief should be sacred from intrusion, and most of all from you. Have loved! Your words are mockery, sir."

"I have much to say," continued Robert; "but I tremble for the effect of my communication. Yet I know myself how much joy the human heart can bear."

"Speak-quick, and tell me what you mean," cried Roland, turning upon him with a flashing eye.

"What if I should tell you that she whom you mourn as dead still lives, and lives for you. Nay, stay and hear me, and believe me. I would not dare trifle with your sorrow. Linda lives, and, reserving only a brother's rights, I yield to you every claim upon her love."

Roland gazed upon Robert for a moment, with a strange bewildered expression, then pressing both hands upon his forehead, turned of ashy paleness.

Fearful that he had been too abrupt in his communication, Robert laid his hand gently on his arm, and said:

"Let me say to thee, my brother, as a holy friend did to me, when my soul fainted under the burden of its joy, let religion chasten thy felicity. Remember the great Giver of so much happiness."

As Robert uttered these words in a calm, impressive voice, Roland's countenance lost its wild expression, his head gradually bent down, then throwing his arm around Robert's neck, he wept, even as passionate and tender woman weeps.

Robert's glistening eyes attested the depth of his sympathy. No feeling of jealousy now mingled its bitterness with the pure fountain of his thoughts. He found a noble, self-sacrificing spirit its own reward. The hour he had been so long dreading, as the test of his sincerity and truth, was come, and he had strength to yield Linda to another—nay, he felt a joy in the sacrifice, so pure and exalted, he would not have exchanged it for all that passion and self-indulgence in their most prodigal moods could offer.

Roland and Linda met: but we will imitate the delicacy of Robert, and not intrude on the sacredness of the interview. It is difficult to describe joy, rising, Lazarus-like, from the tomb of despair. The artist can paint the black cloud of the gathering tempest, but when a glorious sun-burst comes flashing out from the gloom, he drops his pencil, conscious of the impotence of his genius, Unless to mortal it were given To dip his brush in dyes of heaven.

BY THE LONG MOSS SPRING

From 'Marcus Warland; or, The Long Moss Spring.'

The water! the water!

Where I have shed salt tears;
In loneliness and friendliness,
A thing of tender years.

The water! the water!

How bless'd to me thou art,
Thus sounding in life's solitude
The music of my heart,
And filling it, despite of sadness,
With dreamings of departed gladness.

-Motherwell.

Marcus sat beside the Long Moss Spring, the morning sunbeams glancing through the broad leaves of the magnolia and the brilliant foliage of the holly, and playing on his golden hair. He held in his hand a fishing-rod, whose long line floated on the water; and though his eye was fixed on the buoyant cork, there was no hope or excitement in its gaze. His face was pale and wore a severe expression, very different from the usual joyousness and thoughtlessness of childhood. Even when the silvery trout and shining perch, lured by the bait, hung quivering on the hook, and were thrown, fluttering like wounded birds through the air, to fall panting, then pulseless, at his side, he showed no consciousness of success, no elation at the number of his scaly victims. Tears, even, large and slowly gathering tears, rolled gradually and reluctantly down his fair oval cheeks; they were not like the sudden. drenching shower, that leaves the air purer and the sky bluer, but the drops that issue from the wounded bark formed of the life-blood of the tree.

Beautiful was the spot where the boy sat, and beautiful the vernal morning that awakened Nature to the joy and the beauty of youth. The fountain, over whose basin he was leaning, was one of those clear, deep, pellucid springs, that gush up in the green wilds of southern Georgia, forming a feature of such exquisite loveliness in the landscape, that the traveler pauses on the margin, feeling as if he had found one of those enchanted springs of which we read in fairy land, whose waters are too bright, too pure, too serene for earth.

The stone which formed the basin of the fountain was smooth and calcareous, hollowed out by the friction of the waters, and gleaming white and cold through their diaphanous drapery. In the centre of this basin, where the spring gushed in all its depth and strength, it was so dark it looked like an opaque body, impervious to the eye, whence it flowed over the edge of its rocky receptacle in a full, rejoicing current, sweeping over its mossy bed, and bearing its sounding tribute to the Chattahoochee, "rolling rapidly." The mossy bed to which we have alluded was not the verdant velvet that covers with a short, curling nap the ancient rock and the gray old tree, but long, slender, emerald-green plumes, waving under the water, and assuming through its mirror a tinge of deep and irradiant blue. Nothing can be imagined more rich and graceful than this carpet for the fountain's silvery tread, and which seems to bend beneath it, as the light spray rustling in the breeze. The golden water-lily gleamed up through the crystal, and floated along the margin on its long and undulating stems.

THE HYPOCRITE UNMASKED

From 'The Planter's Northern Bride.'

Moreland's blood began to seethe in his veins when he saw Vulcan, far more embruted and animal in appearance than when he defied him over the ashes of the dead, ascend the platform and sit down side by side with his own father-in-law; when he saw the vile impostor, whose path had been marked with the slime of the snake, the brand of the incendiary, and the steel of the assassin, standing in that elevated position, the centre of every gazing eye, assuming to be the champion of truth and humanity, while violating their most sacred rights. He announced himself as a traveler recently returned from the South, that beautiful, but accursed region, "where all save the spirit of man was divine." He had had the most abundant opportunities of studying and examining its social and domestic institutions, and he was prepared to lay the result before an intelligent and enlightened community.

He began with the utmost calmness and deliberation, describing the delicious climate, the luxuriant vegetation, the gardens of roses, the bowers of jessamine, and groves of orange trees, which made an Eden of that smiling land. He dwelt with enthusiastic admiration on the grace and loveliness of its daughters, the brave and gallant bearing of its sons. One would have supposed that to praise was his only task; but he was making a flowering groundwork, to enhance by contrast the effect of the hideous structure he was about to rear upon it. Anon the hand that had been gently scattering roses, began to hurl the hissing thunderbolt, and in the wild and thrilling eloquence which succeeded, Moreland found no difficulty in recognizing the splendid orator of the African Church. He heard himself (for in what other planter's home had he been so closely domesticated?) described as a demon of cruelty, his slaves the subjects of the most atrocious barbarity, his plantation the scene of horrors that baffled the power of imagination to conceive. The clanking chain, the excoriating manacle, the gashing scourge, the burning brand, were represented as tortures in daily, nay, even in hourly use; the shrieks of womanhood, the cries of infancy, and the lamentations of age, as no more regarded than the velling of wild beasts or the whistling of the wind. The audience was becoming painfully excited. Ladies were passing little bottles containing the spirits of ammonia from one to the other, and covering their faces with their white handkerchiefs: men groaned audibly, and many a dark and sinister glance was turned to the dim corner, where the Southern planter sat, unseen as yet by the orator of the night.

"Hush, hush!" whispered Dr. Darley to the excited and indignant Moreland. "Not for worlds would I have you prematurely interrupt this scene. Wait, and you shall have a signal triumph,"

It was a terrible struggle with Moreland to keep from rushing forward and hurling the wretch from the platform, exposing him at once to the crowd, whom he was deluding by his falsehoods and magnetizing by his electrical eloquence.

"Behold," said Brainard, after having exhausted, for the time, the vocabulary of horrors, "behold one of the poor victims of Southern barbarity—behold his mutilated fingers, his branded and disfigured body. Hold out your hand, long-suffering son of Africa—and show the awful mark of your master's cruelty."

Vulcan stretched out his left hand, in which the two central fingers were wanting, making a sickening chasm. We have already related the accident which caused this loss, as well as the burn which had left such an enduring cicatrice.

"Look at this poor disfigured shoulder," continued Brainard, folding back the negro's shirt-collar and displaying a terrible-looking scar (probably embellished by a few touches of reddish paint). "This is but a small portion of the scars which seam and corrugate his whole body."

Groans and faint shrieks were now heard from every part of the house, and again Dr. Darley's restraining hand was laid on Moreland's quivering arm.

"Not yet, not yet! We must hear the negro's story. The climax is to come."

But just as Vulcan opened his huge lips to speak, in obedience to a gesture of Brainard, and people were pressing forward, half standing in their eagerness to catch every word of the hideous speaker, a young man forced his way through the crowd in the doorway and rushed to the centre of the hall. So sudden was his entrance, so rapid his movements, that no one recognized his colour till, slackening his pace and looking wildly round him, he disclosed the bright yellow hue and dark-beaming eyes of the mulatto.

"Master, master, Mars Russell!" he exclaimed, breath-lessly, pantingly; "where are you? Why don't you speak, and tell 'em they're all lies? Why don't you tell 'em it's Vulcan, that tried to kill you, and Master Brainard, that tried to make everybody kill you? You may kill me if you want to!" cried he, shaking his clenched fist at the astonished Brainard. "I don't care if you do! I'll call you a story-teller and a rogue. I'd a heap rather be killed than stand still and hear the best master that ever lived made out a monster and a brute!"

It is impossible to give the faintest conception of the effect of this impassioned appeal. The young republicans in the windows brought down their sticks like rattling thunder, while, high above the din, several voices were heard exclaiming"Put him out, put him out!" and many leaped forward to execute the order.

"Stop!" exclaimed a voice of command, and Moreland, without waiting to make a passage through the people, sprang from bench to bench, till he reached the spot where Albert stood, directly opposite the platform, in the full glare of the lamplight. With glowing cheek and flashing eye, he faced the bold, but now pale impostor and cowering slave, then turning to the people:

"Let no one," he cried, "on their peril, touch this boy. He is under my protection, and I will defend him with my life. He has spoken the truth. This man is a vile impostor. Pretending to be a minister of God, he introduced himself into my household, and, under the cloak of religion, plotted the most damning designs. I received him as a friend, cherished him as a brother, and obtained for him the confidence of a generous and trusting community. I blush for my own weakness; I pity the delusion of others. As to the horrible charges he has brought against me and my Southern brethren, I scorn to deny them. If you could believe such atrocities of any man, your good opinion would be valueless to me. That you can believe them of me, knowing me, as most of you now do, I know it is impossible. Had he been less malignant, he had done me more evil."

"I have spoken the truth, and nothing but the truth," interrupted Brainard, grinding his teeth with suppressed rage; "our black brother can bear witness to all I have declared."

But "our black brother" did not seem disposed to back his falsehoods with the boldness he had anticipated. Though brute force, roused by long continued excitement, had once triumphed over moral cowardice, it gave him no sustaining influence now, and he shrank and quailed before the thrilling eye of his deserted and injured master. The influence of early habits and feelings resumed its sway, and gleamings of his better nature struggled through the darkness of falsehood and treachery. Notwithstanding the bluntness of his perceptions, he felt the power of Moreland's moral superiority over Brainard, and when he found himself called upon to confirm his unblushing lies in the pure light of his master's countenance, a sudden loathing for the white man who could stoop to such degradation filled his mind; and a strong desire for the favor he had forfeited and the place he had lost, stirred his heart.

"Speak, Vulcan!" cried Moreland, who had marked the changes of his dark face with intense interest, "speak! and in the presence of an all-hearing God, say if this man utters the truth, or I."

"You, massa, you!" burst spontaneously from the lips of the negro; and it seemed as if a portion of blackness rolled away from his face, with the relieving consciousness of having borne testimony to the truth.

BENJAMIN HARVEY HILL

LUCIAN LAMAR KNIGHT

RITTEN with prominence on the roster of Georgia's illustrious sons is the name of Benjamin Harvey Hill, who was born on September 14, 1823, in Hillsborough, Jasper County, right in the heart of that "old red belt which encircles the State from the Savannah to the Chattahoochee." He was the seventh son of nine children that blessed the marriage of Sarah Parham and John Hill, whose ancestors were respectively Welsh and Irish. At the beginning of the Nineteenth Century John Hill, a sturdy Methodist, had removed from North Carolina and settled in Jasper County, but when Benjamin was a boy the family went to live at La Grange, Troup County, close to the Alabama border.

Because he possessed a slender education himself the father fully realized the value of culture, and at sixteen years of age Benjamin was singled out from his brothers and sisters as best fitted to receive a higher education than could be afforded to all. Accordingly he was sent to the Rev. Mr. Corbin, of Yale, under whose tutelage he made rapid progress. Interest in his promising pupil led the teacher to urge a college course at his own alma mater, but the loyal young Georgian preferred his State's University at Athens, whither he went in 1841, after his mother and an aunt had contributed their little incomes to the money his father could spare toward the necessary expenses. But these selfsacrificing relatives were amply repaid, for the rustic boy in long jeans coat and scant trousers quickly developed into a brilliant student who, three years later, was graduated with the highest honors. Among his classmates he had already won renown as an invincible debater, and as the valedictorian his oration, with fullest promise of his remarkable eloquence, was enthusiastically applauded by William C. Preston, of South Carolina, and by Judge Berrien, of Georgia, both of whom happened to be present at the exercises.

Upon leaving college he entered the law office of William Dougherty, and after a year's study was admitted to the bar. In November, 1845, he married Miss Caroline E. Holt, the daughter of Cicero Holt, then a prominent lawyer of Athens, Georgia, and the youthful couple settled in La Grange, where Benjamin Harvey Hill began the practice of his profession. Distinction in the chosen field came soon, and in February, 1848, he was admitted to the Supreme Court of his native State.

The Missouri Compromise measures stirred him, as indeed they did many others, into political activity, and he entered the public arena at twenty-eight years of age, over six feet one in height, and with eyes "oratorically grey." In 1851 he was elected to the Lower House of the General Assembly, from Troup County. Between that year and 1854 he declined reëlection to the Legislature, and refused nomination for Congress, but the repeal of the Compromise roused his wrath, and he became one of the most powerful champions of the Union and the Constitution. During the period of storm and stress his followers affectionately dubbed him "Our Ben." a soubriquet which stuck to him all through his career. A staunch Union man, his philippics against all radicalism, especially that concerned with the slavery agitation, rang through the length and breadth of Georgia. When the old Whig party was dissolved in the State, he allied himself with the American or Know-Nothing party, though his sympathies were not entirely given up to it. However, in 1856, he was an elector-at-large for Fillmore and Donelson, on that ticket, and the next year he became its candidate for Governor. Defeated, he still remained the idol of his party, and in 1859 he was elected a member of the State Senate. All this time his reputation as a lawyer had been growing, and he was acknowledged the foremost advocate in his State. Before a jury he had few equals, and many of his speeches in important cases have been preserved, and are still cited by members of the bar.

During the momentous campaign of 1860 he canvassed the State for Bell and Everett, and was chosen a delegate to the Secession Convention held at Milledgeville, on January 16, 1861. Essentially a Union man, he there made magnificent arguments for the preservation of our national unity, and sought to stay the impending dissolution, even as his celebrated confrère, Alexander H. Stephens, sought to do at the same convocation. But when secession had been irrevocably resolved upon, he followed the lead of his State, casting his fortunes with her fate. Subsequently he became a member of the provisional Confederate Congress, which met at Montgomery, Alabama, on February 4, 1861, and in the fall of that year was elected by the Georgia Legislature over Toombs, Jackson and Iverson, a member of the Confederate Senate, at Richmond, in which body he served during the whole period of the Civil War. Furthermore, though the youngest member of that body, he was elected chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a position which entailed immense labor and great responsibility. Reluctant though he had been to admit the necessity for secession, he was among the last to give up the "Lost Cause," and delivered a number of fiery addresses advocating the maintenance of the Confederacy. This obstinate attitude resulted in his arrest after the South suffered final defeat, and in his imprisonment from May to July, 1865, at Fort Lafayette, in New York Bay, where he remained till paroled by President Johnson. Despite all this notoriety in the North his name was proposed for the United States Senate in 1866, but it was eventually deemed imprudent to elect him under the circumstances. Undoubtedly his seat in the Senate would have been denied him.

For the succeeding decade he held no actual office, but besides his large law practice he gave every attention and energy to the weal of the South, and became her indomitable champion against the measures of Reconstruction. On July 10, 1867, he made a memorable speech against the measures proposed by Congress, and seven days later he delivered in Atlanta another remarkable arraignment of the Government in what is now known as the "Davis Hall speech." From that time the fight for political redemption was ioined and in 1869 appeared his scathing "Notes on the Situation," which have been accorded first rank in political literature. They were indited with a pen dipped in the very gall of bitterness, and in alluding to them Henry W. Grady said: "In my opinion they stand alone as the profoundest and most eloquent political essays ever penned by an American." These "Notes" won their author the state leadership, and he may be said to have reorganized the Democratic party in Georgia. Every one of his speeches had a decided effect upon his fellow-citizens, especially the one called the "Bush-Arbor speech," which he delivered on July 23, 1868, in Atlanta. He could not stem the tide of misery, however, which swept over the South, and between 1870 and 1872 he withdrew from the public, and advised the people to "accept the situation," since successful resistance seemed no longer possible.

In 1872 he was a zealous supporter of Horace Greeley for President, and three years later Benjamin Harvey Hill was elected to the Forty-fourth Congress to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Garnett McMillan. So on December 6, 1875, he took his seat in the first Democratic Congress since the war, and in the following January he distinguished himself in the debate on the "Amnesty bill." James G. Blaine's attack on the South as responsible for the alleged "atrocities" at Andersonville brought forth the famous reply on January 11, 1876. At one blow were silenced the slanderers of the South. Twenty thousand copies of the speech were at once struck off and circulated throughout the North, contained the oft-quoted, oft-declaimed peroration, a section of which follows: "Is the bosom of the country always to be torn with the miserable sectional debate, whenever a Presidential election is pending? The victory of the North was absolute, and God knows the submission of the South was complete! But, sir, we have recovered from the humiliation of defeat, and we come here among you and ask you to give us the greetings accorded to brothers by brothers. We propose to join you in every patriotic endeavor and to unite with you in every patriotic aspiration that looks to the benefit, the advancement, and the honor of every part of our common country. Let us, gentlemen of all parties, in this centennial year, indeed have a jubilee of freedom. We divide with you the glories of the Revolution and of the succeeding years of our national life, before the unhappy division, that four years' night of gloom and despair; and so shall we divide with you the glories of all the future. We are here; we are in the house of our fathers; our brothers are our companions, and we are at home to stay, thank God! We come charging upon the Union no wrongs to us. The Union never wronged us. The Union has been an unmixed blessing to every section, to every state, and to every man of every color in America. We charge all our wrongs upon that 'higher law' fanaticism, that never kept a pledge nor obeyed a law. Brave Union men of the North-you who fought for the Union for the sake of the Union, you who ceased to fight when the battle ended and the sword was sheathed—we have no quarrel with you, whether Republicans or Democrats. We felt your heavy arm in the carnage of the battle; but above the roar of the cannon. we heard your voice of kindness calling, 'Brothers, come back!' and we bear witness to you this day that that voice of kindness did more to thin the Confederate ranks and weaken the Confederate arm than did all the artillery employed in the struggle."

Again, on January 17, 1877, he made a speech in favor of the Electoral Commission, characterizing it as a measure wholly constitutional, wise in every provision, and patriotic in every purpose. At the expiration of his term in Congress he was unanimously reelected, but on March 4, 1877, resigned to take his seat in the Senate, having defeated the Hon. Thomas M. Norwood and ex-Governor James M. Smith for that office. Here he first signalized himself in the great contest over the bill presented by the Judiciary Committee, which proposed to establish a sinking fund to secure the repayment of a loan made by the United States to the Union Pacific and the Central Railroad companies. He proved the measures unconstitutional, and the bill failed to pass. From that hour the fame of Senator Hill as a constitutional lawyer was firmly established, and many critics have compared him in this capacity with the eminent Englishman, Erskine. Among other noteworthy speeches of his senatorial career was one on the subject of the coinage of silver dollars, February 8, 1878, which exhibited a minute knowledge of the intricacies of finance, and another on "The Union and Its Enemies," May 10, 1879, which Senator Voorhees pronounced the greatest speech delivered in the Senate within a quarter of a century. This was an answer to Blaine, Edmunds and Chandler, and was a comprehensive exposition of the dual system of our Government, together with an impassioned defense of the South and the Democratic party. As Senator he also served on the committees on Privileges and Elections, Revolutionary Claims, and Mines and Mining. Added to these distinguished services are his labors on the Committee on Foreign Relations, and his work as chairman of the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

During 1878-1879 he was annoyed by what he took to be a tiny pimple on the left side of his tongue. Little or no serious attention was given it until the irritation became more aggravated, then he sought medical advice at the hands of a homoepathic physician, who treated it as a "benign ulcer." Eight months passed without relief, and he was compelled to consult the famous Dr. Gross, of Philadelphia, who diagnosed the case as cancer of the tongue. The knife was resorted to, but the cancerous taint could not be eradicated. Dr. Gross declared the case hopeless, and the sufferer went for relief to Eureka Springs, the waters of which were reputed marvelously curative in cancerous affections. Obtaining not the slightest benefit, he determined to return home, saying: "Whatever God may have in the future, I am willing to bear without a murmur. But, if I must die, I will go back to the old State that gave me birth, and die on her soil, and among my own people." Arrived at Atlanta, Georgia, he grew steadily worse, and for a month before his death, articulation having become almost impossible, he was obliged to use pencil and pad. A few hours ere the end came his pastor, the Rev. Clement A. Evans, heard him utter the simple yet significant words, "Almost home," and the last word traced on the pad was "Dearest," addressed to his wife.

His death took place on the sixteenth of August, 1882, and it was felt as a personal bereavement in every part of the State of Georgia. The public funeral in Atlanta was attended by a vast concourse of mourners, State officials, Congressmen, and delegates from all the principal towns of Georgia. Flags were at half-mast and many business houses were closed during the obsequies. On May 1, 1886, a statue of Senator Hill was unveiled in Atlanta.

A HUSBAND'S TRIBUTE

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, February 14, 1864.

This day is like my own heart-idol—bright, sweet, and comforting. You ought to be very happy, if to bless others be the best source of happiness. Recently, I have found my thoughts absorbed for hours, studying your character. The subject is certainly not new, but beauties are ever developing—the last always the loveliest.

The dearest of all words are wife, home and child. They mean love, comfort, and hope, when defined by my experience. I have never found but one thought, which your character suggested, which troubled me; and this thought is a perpetual trouble. You are so much better than I that I often feel humbled. I have often strained myself to perform something good and noble that I might feel worthy to be your husband. In qualities that elevate and dignify; in virtues that are pure, sincere, and steadfast, I never saw the equal of my wife. Eighteen years of companionship have been eighteen years of admiration of your ever-increasing worth. If I cannot compensate you with the return of a character equal to your own in intrinsic merit, I have at least the very comforting reflection that it has ever been my business to serve you, my delight to please you, and my ambition to be like you.

It saddens me to turn from your character to the analysis of my own. But I can claim some virtues, though I cannot be what my desires would make me. I would be useful to all men—Heaven knows I would; but alas, alas! how feeble are my efforts and feebler my powers! My sphere is different from yours. You are equal to your duties. I am utterly unequal to mine. I see the storm which is sweeping over my country, prostrating in its path the glories of the past, the blessings of the present, and almost all the hopes of the future; and I know it is but a hurricane of passion, hate and ambition, and I would lift my voice to stay its fury; but the voice is soundless in the universal roar and I am helpless.

If I had power equal to my wishes, this earth should be a paradise, and no living creature should feel pain. The virtue of universal good-will I can claim. I can also admire good deeds in others. I envy no man, but I would emulate the best. My energies are not equal to my desires, and seeing, as I do, much that ought to be done and yet doing myself so little, I cannot but feel discontented with myself.

But if to appreciate one's companion be the virtue of domestic life, then this is my solid merit; for whether I have a country or not, even a home or not, I expect to die as I have lived—my wife's worshipper.

One week from to-day and I shall be speeding away to the trysting-place—my wife's home and my children's playground. Never did a caged eagle look to the clear, bright heavens with a more earnest longing, nor the famished deer leap to the cooling water-brook with a more cheerful bound. O God, my heart is glad! my heart is glad! Home, sweet home; children, dear children; wife, dear wife. How like the descending dews on the parched grass do thoughts of resting there and with these fall upon my tired spirit.

Blithe are the notes of the singing bluebird, tender the petals of the budding flower, and bright is the dawn of the breaking day, when cold winter ends the frosty reign, and balmy spring blesses the earth with smiling freshness and queenly beauty; but far more blithe and tender and cheerful is the heart of him who, when chilling absence is over, is permitted to return to a home where love and confidence make a perpetual spring-time for the soul.

Unworthy as I am, this happiness is mine; and whatever other favors a kind and wise Providence may withhold or grant, for this alone I may daily and hourly say: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name."

Remember me kindly to all the household, and kiss the dear children for the happy returning father.

Your devoted husband, B. H. Hill.

TRIBUTE TO LEE AND DAVIS

From address delivered before the Southern Historical Society at Atlanta, Georgia, February 18, 1874.

No people, ancient or modern, can look with more pride to the verdict which history will be compelled to render upon the merits and characters of our two chief leaders—the one in military and the other in the civil service. Most other leaders are great because of fortunate results, and heroes because of success. Davis and Lee, because of qualities in themselves, are great in the face of fortune, and heroes in spite of defeat.

When the future historian shall come to survey the character of Lee, he will find it rising like a huge mountain above the undulating plain of humanity, and he must lift his eyes high toward Heaven to catch its summit. He possessed every virtue of other great commanders without their vices. He was a foe without hate; a friend without treachery; a soldier without cruelty; a victor without oppression, and a victim without murmuring. He was a public officer without vices; a private citizen without a wrong; a neighbor without reproach; a Christian without hypocrisy, and a man without guile. He was Cæsar, without his ambition; Frederick, without his tyranny; Napoleon, without his selfishness, and Washington, without his reward. He was obedient to authority as a servant, and royal in authority as a true king. He was gentle as a woman in life; modest and pure as a virgin in thought; watchful as a Roman vestal in duty; submissive to law as Socrates; and grand in battle as Achilles!

There were many peculiarities in the habits and character of Lee which are but little known and which may be studied with profit. He studiously avoided giving opinions upon subjects which it had not been his calling or training to investigate; and sometimes I thought he carried this great virtue too far. Neither the President, nor Congress, nor friends could get his views upon any public question not strictly military, and no man had so much quiet, unobtrusive contempt for what he called "military statesmen and political generals." Meeting him once in the streets of Richmond, as I was going out and he going in the executive office, I said to him: "General, I wish you would give us your opinion as to the propriety of changing the seat of government, and going further South."

"That is a political question, Mr. Hill, and you politicians must determine it. I shall endeavor to take care of the army and you must make the laws and control the government."

"Ah, General," I said, "but you will have to change that rule, and form and express political opinions; for, if we establish our independence, the people will make you Mr. Davis's successor."

"Never, sir," he replied, with a firm dignity that belonged only to Lee. "That I will never permit. Whatever talents I may possess (and they are but limited) are military talents. My education and training are military. I think the military and civil talents are distinct, if not different, and full duty in either sphere is about as much as one man can qualify himself to perform. I shall not do the people the injustice to accept high civil office, with whose questions it has not been my business to become familiar."

"Well, but General," I insisted, "history does not sustain your view. Cæsar, and Frederick of Prussia, and Bonaparte, were all great statesmen as well as great generals."

"And all great tyrants," he promptly rejoined. "I speak of the proper rule in republics, where, I think, we should have neither military statesmen nor political generals."

"But Washington was both, and yet not a tyrant," I repeated.

And with a beautiful smile, he said: "Washington was an exception to all rule, and there was none like him."

I could find no words to answer, but instantly I said in thought: "Surely Washington is no longer the only exception, for one like him, if not even greater, is here."

Lee sometimes indulged in satire, to which his greatness gave point and power. He was especially severe on newspaper criticisms of military movements—subjects about which the writers knew nothing.

"We made a great mistake, Mr. Hill, in the beginning of our struggle, and I fear, in spite of all we can do, it will prove to be a fatal mistake," he said to me, after General Bragg ceased to command the Army of Tennessee, an event Lee deplored.

"What mistake is that, General?"

"Why, sir, in the beginning, we appointed all our worst generals to command the armies, and all our best generals to edit the newspapers. As you know, I have planned some campaigns and quite a number of battles. I have given the work all the care and thought I could, and sometimes when my plans were completed, as far as I could see, they seemed to be perfect. But when I fought them through, I discovered defects and occasionally wondered I did not see some of the defects in advance. When it was all over I found. by reading a newspaper, that these best editor-generals saw all the defects plainly from the start. Unfortunately they did not communicate their knowledge to me until it was too late!" Then, after a pause, he added, with a beautiful, grave expression I can never forget: "I have no ambition but to serve the Confederacy, and do all I can to win our independence. I am willing to serve in any capacity to which the authorities may assign me. I have done the best I could in the field, and have not succeeded as I could wish. I am willing to yield my place to these best generals and I will do my best for the cause editing the newspaper!"

Jefferson Davis was as great in the Cabinet as Lee in the field. He was more resentful in temper, and more aggressive in his nature than Lee. His position, too, more exposed him to assaults from our own people. He had to make all appointments, and though often upon the recommendation of others, all the blame of mistake was charged to him, and mistakes were often charged by disappointed seekers and their friends which were not made. He also made recommendations for enactments, and though these measures, especially the military portion, invariably had the concurrence of and often originated with Lee, the opposition of malcontents was often directed at Davis. It is astonishing how men in high positions, and supposed to be great, would make war on the whole administration for the most trivial personal disappointment. Failures to get places for favorites of very ordinary character have inspired long harangues against the most important measures, and they were continued and repeated even after those measures became laws. "Can you believe," he said to me once, "that men-statesmen-in a struggle like this, would hazard an injury to the cause because of their personal grievances, even if they were well founded?" "Certainly," I replied "I not only believe it, but I know it. There are men who regard themselves with more devotion than they do the cause. If such men offer you counsel you do not take, or ask appointments you do not make, however you may be sustained in such action by Lee and all the Cabinet, and even the Congress, they accept your refusal as questioning their wisdom, and as personal war on them." "I cannot conceive of such a feeling," he said. "I have but one enemy to fight, and that is our common enemy. I may make mistakes, and doubtless I do; but I do the best I can with all the lights at the time before me. God knows, I would sacrifice most willingly my life, much more my opinions, to defeat that enemy."

We all remember the fierce war which was made in Georgia against certain war measures of the Congress, and against Mr. Davis for recommending them. Conscription and impressment, especially, were denounced as unconstitutional and void, and not binding on soldiers or people. And then, the limited suspension of habeas corpus was made the occasion for a concerted movement on the Legislature, assembled in extra session, to array the State in hostility to the Confederate Administration. It failed. This was in the dark days of 1864. On returning to Richmond after this, I made the usual call of courtesy—no, of duty and of pleasure—on the President. As I arose to leave him, I said: "Mr. President, I am happy to say to you, that, notwithstanding some indications to the contrary, the people of Georgia will cordially sustain you in all your efforts to achieve our independence." "And I thank you, sir, for that information, and I have never doubted the fidelity of Georgia." "The people of Georgia sustain you," I added, "not only because they have confidence in you, but chiefly because it is the only way to sustain the cause." And with an expression of sincerity glowing all over his countenance, and with a reverential pathos I can never forget, he said, "God knows my heart, I ask ALL, ALL for the cause; NOTHING, NOTHING for myself." Truer words never fell from nobler lips, nor warmed the heart of a more devoted patriot. These words express in language, the soul, the mind, the purpose, ay, the ambition of Jefferson Davis. It was his misfortune, and the misfortune of the Confederacy, that this was not true of all who were in authority. It was his fault, perhaps, that he did not use his authority to deprive such of their power to do evil.

I am speaking in Atlanta, and it is all the more proper, therefore, that I should speak for the first time in public of the removal of General Johnston from the command of the Army of the Tennessee.

I have heard it said that I advised that removal. This is not true. I gave no advice on the subject, because I was not a military man. You have all heard it said that Mr. Davis was moved by personal hostility to General Johnston, in making this removal. This is not only not true, but it is exceedingly false. I do not know much on the subject of this removal. I was the bearer of messages from General Johnston to the President, and was in Richmond, and sometimes present, during the discussions on the subject. I never saw so much agony in Mr. Davis's face as actually distorted it when the possible necessity for this removal was at first suggested to him. I never heard a eulogy pronounced upon General Johnston by his best friends, as a fighter if he would fight, equal to that which I heard from Mr. Davis during these discussions. I know he consulted with General Lee fully, earnestly and anxiously before this removal. I know that those who pressed the removal, first and most earnestly, in the Cabinet, were those who had been most earnest for General Johnston's original appointment to that command. All these things I do personally know. I was not present when the order for removal was determined upon, but I received it immediately after from a member of the Cabinet, and do not doubt its truth, that Mr. Davis was the very last man who gave his assent to that removal, and he only gave the order when fully satisfied it was absolutely necessary to prevent the surrender of Atlanta without a fight.

The full history of the Hampton Roads commission and conference has never been written. I will not give that history now. Much has been said and published on the subject which is not true. I know why each member of that commission, on our part, was selected. I received from Mr. Davis's own lips a full account of the conversation between himself and the commissioners before their departure from Richmond.

You have heard it said that the President embarrassed the commissioners by giving them positive instructions to make the recognition of independence an ultimatum-a condition precedent to any negotiations. This is not true. Mr. Davis gave the commissioners no written instructions and no ultimatum. He gave them in conversation his views, but leaving much to their discretion. They could best judge how to conduct the conference when they met. His own opinion was, that it would be most proper and wise so to conduct it, if they could, as to receive rather than make propositions. While he did not feel authorized to yield our independence in advance, and should not do so, and while he did not desire them to deceive Mr. Lincoln, or be responsible for any false impressions Mr. Lincoln might have, yet he was willing for them to secure an armistice, although they might be satisfied that Mr. Lincoln, in agreeing to it, did so under the belief that reunion must, as a result, follow. I may add that Mr. Davis had no hope of success, or of securing an armistice, after he learned that Mr. Seward was to accompany Mr. Lincoln. "Mr. Lincoln," he said, "is an honest, well-meaning man, but Seward is wily and treacherous."

I could detain you all night correcting false impressions which have been industriously made against this great and good man. I know Jefferson Davis as I know few men. I have been near him in his public duties; I have seen him by his private fireside; I have witnessed his humble Christian devotions; and I challenge the judgment of history when I say, no people were ever led through the fiery struggle for liberty by a nobler, truer patriot; while the carnage of war and the trials of public life never revealed a purer and more beautiful Christian character.

Those who, during the struggle, prostituted public office for private gain; or used position to promote favorites; or forgot public duty to avenge private griefs; or were derelict or faithless in any form to our cause, are they who condemn and abuse Mr. Davis. And well they may, for of all such he was the contrast, the rebuke and the enemy. Those who were willing to sacrifice themselves for the eause; who were willing to bear trials for its success; who were willing to reap sorrow and poverty that victory might be won, will ever cherish the name of Jefferson Davis, for to all such men he was a glorious peer and a most worthy leader.

I would be ashamed of my own unworthiness if I did not venerate Lee. I would scorn my own nature if I did not love Davis. I would question my own integrity and patriotism if I did not honor and admire both. There are some who affect to praise Lee and condemn Davis. But of all such, Lee himself would be ashamed. No two leaders ever leaned, each on the other, in such beautiful trust and absolute confidence. Hand in hand, and heart to heart, they moved in front of the dire struggle of their people for independence—a noble pair of brothers. And if fidelity to right, endurance of trials, and sacrifice of self for others, can win title to a place with the good in the great hereafter, then Davis and Lee will meet where wars are not waged, and slanderers are not heard; and as heart to heart, and wing to wing, they fly through the courts of Heaven, admiring angels will say, "What a noble pair of brothers!"

THE FLAG OF OUR FATHERS

From an address on accepting a national flag, Atlanta, Georgia, September, 1876.

Fellow-citizens, you cannot too well contemplate these two grand features of this system. When you understand them thoroughly, you comprehend the great general character of our American system of government, and never otherwise. Now, both governments derive their authority from the same source—the people. The government of each state deriving its authority from the people of that state, and the General Government deriving its authority from the people of all states, each state acting through its own people. Now there is no conflict between these two jurisdictions. Each has its own sphere. Each has its own functions. They are coequal; they are coordinate; they are also coindependent. and yet coworkers in the one grand end of preserving the rights and liberties of the same people. There never was a reason on earth why there should have been any conflict between their jurisdictions—if patriotism had controlled all public men. You see, each of these governments also is a perfect government. The General Government is a perfect government, having its own legislature, its own judiciary, and its own executive power. So you see also each state government is a perfect government, having its own legislature, its own judiciary, and its own executive power. Each perfect in its own domain, in the exercise of its own functions. But, then, neither alone is a complete government, because a complete government is that which protects its citizens in both their internal and external relations. But as the state government protects the citizen in his internal relations, and the General Government in his external relations, you see, while both governments are perfect in their sphere, it takes both together to make a complete government for the citizen. Now, then, who is the enemy of that government? The state government is a part of the American Union, just as much as the General Government is a part of the American Union. It takes both to complete the great system known as the American Union. Who, then, I repeat, is a disunionist? The man who strikes at the Federal Government is a disunionist, because he strikes at an essential feature of the system which makes the American Union. But the man who strikes at the state government is also a disunionist, because he strikes at an equally essential feature of the same system. He alone is a perfect Union man who is faithful to the whole system—to both the General Government and the state government, each in its sphere. Blot out the stars from that flag and you have no American flag; blot out the states from this Union and you have no American Union! Cripple the states and you cripple the Union. Invade the states and you invade the Union. Make war on the states and you are a traitor making war on the Union.

Fellow-citizens, this system of government, this American Union, I have always said has no parallel in history. I say here to-day that it is the best, the wisest, the grandest system of government the world ever saw. One mistake our statesmen have made has consisted in trying to judge this Government by previous systems. There is nothing in history like it. The Solons of Greece had as little comprehension of this American system of government as the soldier with his javelin, at Marathon, had of our modern columbiads. or the sailor with his galley, at Salamis, had of our modern iron-clads. The Catos and Ciceros of Rome had as little comprehension of the grandeur and wisdom and beauty of our American system as the dweller upon the banks of the sluggish Tiber had of the length, depth and power of the Mississippi. No, my American friends, you are the heirs under Providence of the greatest system of government the world ever saw. If you destroy it there is no hope beyond. This system is as new to the science of government as was the discovery of America new to the map of the world. And I have sometimes thought that Providence, tired of the wranglings and strifes, and oppressions, and wrongs of the governments in Europe and Asia for thousands of years, had reserved this grand continent, that the wearied and oppressed of all nations might come and form by their mingling a new people on a new continent, and inspired our fathers to provide for them a new system of government, most wisely adapted to their wants and happiness, and thus develop the highest type of the human race.

The greatest enemy this Union has hitherto had has been sectionalism. No one state has ever endangered the General Government, and the General Government could not undertake to endanger any one state without exciting the ire of all. But sectionalism, by which I mean the desire of one section of the country, composed of several states, to either use, abuse, or destroy the General Government for the purpose of promoting ideas or interests peculiar to that section, has proved, in our history, to be the most dangerous enemy to the system of government which makes the American Union. This sectionalism has assumed its most dangerous form whenever it has been organized into geographical parties and distinctions. Washington saw this spirit of sectionalism even in the midst of the Revolution. He saw it during his administration.

It came near destroying the system on several occasions during his administration. And in his farewell address he warned his countrymen, in the strongest terms, against the formation of parties on geographical lines, ideas and distinctions. I am dealing to-day with history and not mere parties. But, necessarily, history involves parties, and I shall state nothing but what history proves to be true and, following up this history with my argument, I state that the first large sectional party ever organized in America upon geographical lines and ideas, and directly contrary to Washington's warning, was the Republican party of the North. That party, twenty-one years ago, organized upon a geographical basis, upon sectional ideas and for sectional purposes. Its organization was confined to the Northern States. It had no organization in any Southern state; it expected none and desired none, because its animating spirit of sectionalism was animosity to Southern institutions. fore, it could be no other than a sectional party, organized on a geographical line, to promote ideas peculiar to one section against property peculiar to the other section. That sectional party provoked into existence naturally a Southern sectional party, one antagonizing the other. The last sectional party took its name as the Southern Rights or Secession party. Now, a party is not less sectional because it remains in the Union; because the very worst and most unmanly form of disunion is that which seeks to hold on to the government of the Union for the purpose of accomplishing sectional objects, and thereby destroying the system on which the Union was founded. Whatever else may be said of secession—and I concede it was a madness—it was at least manly and direct. It scorned to use the Union to promote sectional ideas. It would not violate the Constitution in the name of loyalty. It would not hold the government to sell its offices. It was unwise and suicidal, but still brave and manly.

Now, when these two sectional parties organized, one in the North and the other in the South, you will observe the results. The antagonisms of these two sectional parties continued to increase irritation until secession followed and war was waged. Then, my fellow-countrymen, here is the grand point to which I want to call your attention now. It is this, that the late war was between two sectional parties. The Union represented by that flag was no party to that war save as a weeping, bleeding victim!

True, after the leaders of each sectional party got control of their respective sections to such an extent that war resulted, the Union people of each section went into the armies of their respective sections, and neither ought to be blamed for that. Thousands here who had no sympathy with secession went into the service of the sectional party of the South, against a sectional party North, but they did not go into it to strike at a single principle represented by that flag. Thousands, hundreds of thousands of patriotic Northern men, who had no sympathy with the original sectional organization that led them, when the crisis came went bravely into the fight, as they honestly believed, for the Union; and they acted patriotically and nobly, and we cheerfully concede to them pensions, and all the benefits of their apparent Union position. Each side did what it thought right in standing up to its own side in the sectional war. Thousands in both armies, while slaying each other in a sectional fight, would have given their lives for a true, common American Union. Our Northern friends had the great advantage of being in possession of the government—an advantage which they reaped more from our own folly than their own wisdom—and they used that government to help accomplish their sectional purposes, and that was the great advantage they had of us.

But, my fellow-citizens, it is with no ordinary pride that I, who have opposed all these sectional parties, can stand here in the city of Atlanta, in the very center of all our sorrows, and raise my voice, fearing no successful contradiction when I affirm that the Union never made war upon the South. It was not the Union, my countrymen, that slew your children; it was not the Union that burned your cities; it was not the Union that laid waste your country, invaded your homes, and mocked at your calamity; it was not the Union that reconstructed your states! it was not the Union that disfranchised intelligent citizens and denied them participation in their own governments. No, no! Charge not these wrongs upon the Union of your fathers. Every one of these wrongs was inflicted by a diabolical sectionalism in the very teeth of every principle of the American Union. So equally, I say, the South never made war upon the Union. There has never been an hour when nine out of ten of us would not have given our lives for that Union. We did not leave that Union because we were dissatisfied with it: we did not leave the Union to make war on it-we left the Union because a sectional party had seized it, and we hoped thereby to avoid a conflict. But if war must come, we intended to fight a sectional party and not the Union. Therefore, the late war, with all its disastrous consequences, is the direct result of sectionalism in the North and of sectionalism in the South, and none, I repeat, of these disasters are chargeable on the Union.

When unimpassioned reason shall review our past, there is no subject in all our history on which our American statesmanship, North and South, will be adjudged to have been so unwise, so imbecile, and so utterly deficient as upon that one subject, which stimulated these sectional parties into existence.

There was nothing in slavery which could justify the North in forming a sectional party to cripple or destroy it, and there was nothing in slavery which could justify the South in leaving the Union to maintain it. There was no right in freedom contrary to the Constitution and there was no safety for slavery out of the Union. The whole African race, whether slaves or free, were not worth the American Union. One hour of the American Union has done more for human progress than all the governments formed by the negro race in six thousand years! And the dear noble boys of the white race, North and South, who fell in the late war, slaying each other for the negro, were worth more to civilization and human happiness than the whole African race of the world.

We will do justice to the colored man. We are under the very highest obligations of a brave manhood to do justice to the negro. He is not our equal. He is in our power, and cowardice takes no meaner shape than when power oppresses weakness. But in the name of civilization, in the name of our fathers, in the name of forty millions of living whites and of hundreds of millions of their coming children; in the name of every principle represented by that banner above us, I do protest to-day, that there is nothing in statesmanship, nothing in philanthropy, and nothing in patriotism, which can justify the peril or destruction of the rights and liberties of the white race in crazy wranglings over the rights and liberties of the black race. We have shed more white blood and wasted more white treasure in four years over the liberties of the negro in these states than the entire negro race have shed and wasted for their own liberties in all the ages of the world! And all at the bidding of sectional demagogues who still cry for more!

We have buried, widowed and orphaned one white person for every colored person, old and young, male and female, in America; and yet there are hundreds of demagogues now haranguing the honest, deluded masses of the North, seeking to keep themselves in power, by keeping alive the passions of sectional hate, at the hazard of every right and of every liberty intended to be preserved and protected by our American Union! God of our fathers! how long, oh, how long shall this madness continue and successfully usurp the places, to disgrace the functions of elevated statesmanship?

Above all the din of these sectional quarrelings I would raise my voice, and proclaim to all our people, that there him a barbarian in Africa, reduced him to slavery, brought him to America and our Southern fathers bought him. If that was a crime, were not all our fathers parties to it? Was not here a field for charity and mutual concession? So again, if slavery was a crime, that crime was repeated when it was recognized as property in the Constitution. Who made that recognition? Not only the Northern fathers, not only the Southern fathers, but all our fathers! Was not there a field for mutual deference and concession?

The resolve to manumit the slave by force was the greatest of all possible crimes in our dealings with the negro. It was that fell spirit that organized the sectional parties and precipitated the war which cost us so much, and which threatens to cost us our all in the final destruction of our American Union. Who shall be able to describe the fearful judgment which an unimpassioned and impartial posterity shall pronounce upon the weak, wayward, wicked statesmanship, that could not and would not emancipate the black race without destroying and imperiling everything of right, property or liberty belonging to the white race!

Fellow-citizens, I have stated, but I cannot too often repeat, that all the curses that we have suffered originated, not in adherence to the principles of our Union, but in a departure from those principles. No symbol in the flag above us either taught the war or can justify the war. We owe all our wrongs to unpatriotic sectional parties organized first in the North and then in the South. Sectionalism at the South has been utterly crushed out by the war. Secession is dead, and can have no ressurrection in the South.

* * * * * *

The very perfection of patriotism is animosity to sectionalism. I do not mean only sectionalism at the South. I mean sectionalism anywhere and everywhere. I do not mean sectionalism in the form of secession; I mean sectionalism in any form and in every form. Sectionalism under any pretext, sectionalism for any purpose, is disunionism! And sectional disunionism can take no more odious form, it can wear no more traitorous hue, than when it seeks to seize or hold the powers of our common Union, by teaching the people of the different sections to hate each other. . There is no safety for property, for right, or liberty or union, save in a patriotic return by all sections of our country to the principles of that great system of government whose symbols we read in the flag above us.

My countrymen, have you studied this wonderful American system of free government? Have you compared it with former systems and noted how our forefathers sought to avoid their defects? Let me commend this study to every American citizen to-day. To him who loves liberty, it is more enchanting than romance, more bewitching than love and more elevating than any other science. Our fathers adopted this plan, with improvements in the details which cannot be found in any other system. With what a noble impulse of patriotism they came together from different states and joined their counsels to perfect this system, thenceforward to be known as the "American System of Free Constitutional Government!" The snows that fall on Mount Washington are nor purer than the motives which begot it. The fresh dewladen zephyrs from the orange groves of the South are not sweeter than the hopes its advent inspired. The flight of our own symbolic eagle, though he blow his breath on the sun, cannot be higher than its expected destiny. Have the motives which so inspired our fathers become all corrupt in their children? Are the hopes that sustained them all poisoned to us? Is that high expected destiny all eclipsed, and before its noon?

No, no, forever no! patriots North, patriots South, patriots everywhere, let us hallow this year of Jubilee by burying all our sectional animosities. Let us close our ears to the men and the parties that teach us to hate each other!

Raise high that flag of our fathers! Let Southern breezes kiss it! Let Southern skies reflect it! Southern patriots will love it! Southern sons will defend it, and Southern heroes will die for it! And as its folds unfurl beneath the heavens, let our voices unite and swell the loud invocation: Flag of our Union! Wave on! Wave ever! But wave over freemen, not over subjects! Wave over states, not over provinces! And now let the voices of patriots from the North and from the East, and from the West, join our voices from the South, and send to heaven one universal according chorus! Wave on, flag of our fathers! Wave forever! But wave over a union of equals, not over a despotism of lords and vassals; over a land of law, of liberty, and peace, and not of anarchy, oppression and strife!

THE SEEDS OF KINDNESS

From speech delivered in the Senate of the United States, June 11, 1879.

SIR, I have had to submit to many things I did not approve. I did not approve secession, but when the will of my State was declared I submitted to it. I did not approve of the war of subjugation, but when subjugation was accomplished I submitted to it. I did not approve of Reconstruction. I believe to-day it has inflicted a deeper wound upon the vitals of our Constitutional system than both secession and the war combined, and I did resist it with all the power and zeal, and even invective I could command; but when Reconstruction was accomplished I submitted to it. But I rejoice that one grand fact on which I have always kept my mind remains unchanged. I did fear that the nation could not survive the war. I did fear that in some form the liberties of the people would be subverted and destroyed. I did fear that the character of our government (and I explained it the other day) would be utterly changed. But, sir, the fact to which I allude with so much pride and satisfaction is that we have passed through secession, through the war, and even through the carpet-bag infamies of the South, and the character of our government still remains essentially the same; it has never been changed. The Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, which give certain additional rights to a portion of the people of the country, have not changed in any degree the relations between the states and the Union, nor in any manner the character of our Confederate, Federal and National Government, mixed and composite, as Mr. Madison says it is; and I rejoice that it has been preserved. I look back through that long night of danger and threatening and I feel that every man in this country ought to rejoice that we have passed through that angry storm of passion and hatred, as I trust we are through, with our Constitution still undestroyed; and it ought to be the pride and ambition of every public man, every party, to see to it that it shall be reëstablished and reënthroned in the hearts of the people.

But, sir, I come to the other subject, upon which I want to throw out a defiance. I have passed through the war. I have seen scenes of suffering and many of them. I have seen occasions when many might be tempted to be cruel and unkind; but I defy any human being, I care not what his position is, to put his finger on a single word or act of mine that was ever cruel to a human being. It is impossible to do so, and tell the truth. I am a man of positive convictions; I denounce wrong and have done it unsparingly; but cruelty, unkindness, is no part of my nature, and was never committed by me.

It is not for me, Mr. President, to parade to this country and to this Senate my acts of kindness, and I shall not do it. They were not committed for that purpose. But there is one incident in my life which, as it reflects credit upon others perhaps more than upon myself, and was somewhat of a public character, and as living witnesses are abundant to prove it, I will take occasion to state to the Senate briefly. During the month of April, 1865, the Federal Army under General Wilson passed from Alabama into Georgia, just previous to the surrender of General Johnston and General Lee. The main army under General Wilson entered Georgia at Columbus. There a detachment of Federal soldiers, four thousand I understood, under Colonel La Grange, entered the State of Georgia at West Point, which is in the county in which I resided, and sixteen miles from the county seat, my residence. Hearing of the approach of that army, of course I left hastily. Standing in the ashes of Atlanta, seventy miles away, I received two messages simultaneously. One was that my own house was burning; the other was that General Lee had surrendered. Imagine my surprise when on returning to my home a few days after I found that my house had not only not been burned, but that my family had not been in the slightest degree disturbed, and that a Federal soldier had not put his foot on my premises, the most conspicuous place in the town. Every other citizen, perhaps, had been visited, and some public houses had been burned, warehouses, etc. This was a mystery, and a very great mystery, and to none more a mystery than to myself. I expected, of course, that I should suffer above any other citizen of the town.

I suffered not at all, and all others suffered more or less, and some very severely. It was a mystery to the town; it was the general talk; how was it?

No man doubted my fidelity to the Confederacy, because at that very moment, and for two months before, I had been the only public man in the Confederacy on the stump trying to rally the people against unconditional surrender. Of course the event was of sufficient consequence to induce me to make an effort to explain the mystery. I was told on inquiry that at the battle of West Point-for there was a considerable little battle fought there—a young Federal officer was severely wounded who was a favorite with Colonel La Grange in command, and while not dangerously wounded he was so painfully wounded that he could not go on with the Federal forces. fortunately had a niece living in the town of West Point whose husband was a physician and surgeon. Knowing, as was afterward reported, that the act would be altogether agreeable to me, he went and offered his services to take that young wounded Federal officer to his house and care for him. I suppose that had something to do with it. Then my slaves, who were faithful and devoted to the last hour, claimed that they had gone to the Federal headquarters, for the Federal troops camped two nights and a day in the town, and interposed for the protection of my family. That I supposed also had something to do with it. After all the armies had surrendered, in the month of May, a detachment of Federal soldiers under somebody's orders, I understand here at Washington perhaps the Secretary of War, came to La Grange, and at two o'clock in the morning arrested me and took me off to Atlanta. While waiting there for transportation to Fort La Fayette, a gentleman came to see me who said he came directly from Colonel La Grange, who was then in the city of Macon, and received the following facts from his own lips in explanation of my exemption from pillage on that occasion. Colonel La Grange stated that during the summer or fall of 1864, while the armies of General Johnston and General Sherman were north of Atlanta, in the northern part of Georgia, a number of ladies, Northern ladies by birth, who had been residing in the South and who had passed safely through General Johnston's line under passports from the Confederate Government, on their return North were captured in General Sherman's line and carried to his headquarters under suspicion of being spies. They were of course properly required to give an account of themselves. It turned out that these ladies happened to be some among many who had written me frequently, on this occasion especially, to Richmond, asking my advice as to whether under the circumstances of privation and suffering in the Southern States I would advise them to leave the people who they said had been so kind to them, though Northern ladies, and return to their friends in the North, who had abundance, and if I would give that advice, to give them the proper means of getting through the lines. I sent them everything they needed and advised them to go.

I never heard from them any more. I sent them passports and everything else necessary to take them to their friends in the North. When these ladies were required, at General Sherman's headquarters, to give an account of themselves they were naturally quite exuberant and extravagant in their account of my treatment of them. Colonel La Grange was at that time in General Sherman's headquarters, I believe—I am not sure a member of his staff. The Senator from Illinois will know better: but at least he was there. He became acquainted with these ladies, and heard the story of this kindness, and much in relation to myself that I will not venture to relate. As he approached the town of La Grange, the place of my residence, these facts detailed to him by these ladies came to his recollection, and he informed this gentleman that when he reached within two miles of my residence he stopped his whole command. He gave them first the information that at the next place a Confederate Senator resided, and they would perhaps think that they had a right to raid upon him; but he issued an order forbidding, under severe penalties, any soldier from putting his foot upon my premises under any pretext, and it was strictly obeyed. That was the solution of the mystery.

Mr. President, we are told that when God created the heavens and the earth on the third day, He said: "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth; and it was so." From that day to this it has been so. Yet all these seeds must be sown in their season and in a climate adapted to their nature, else they will perish. But, sir, there is seed which will bear fruit in all seasons and in every clime under the heavens. Plant it in the cold where the snows never melt, or in the heat where the frosts never come; scatter it on the naked rocks or in the most fertile soil; drop it in the water or on the land, and everywhere every seed will germinate and grow and reward the sower. It is tilled by a hand that never tires; it is watched by an eye that never sleeps; it is trained by a power that tempers all the elements to its healthiest maturity. That seed, sir, is kindness, and I have garnered its fruits when and where they were least expected. Will leaders of a great party, will men who aspire to hold in their hands the destinies of millions living and of many more millions vet to live, never learn that abuse and slander and calumny and misrepresentation are not the means which wise or good men employ to give peace to a country, or prosperity to a people, or stability to a government? Will the people themselves at the North never learn that brawling treason and traitors at men for honest differences of opinion is not argument, and proves nothing except that brawlers are neither statesmen nor patriots?

THEOPHILUS HUNTER HILL

HIGHT C. MOORE

THEOPHILUS HUNTER HILL was born October 31, 1836, near Raleigh, in Wake County, North Carolina. He was a son of Dr. William Geddy and Adelaide Virginia (Hunter) Hill; grandson of William and Sarah (Geddy) Hill, and of Theophilus and Martha (Green) Hunter; and great-grandson of Captain Theophilus Hunter of the Revolution and of the Rev. Mr. Hill who was a chaplain in Washington's army. He was a descendant of one of four brothers who, early in the Eighteenth Century, emigrated from Wales and settled in Caroline County, Virginia.

Mr. Hill was educated at James M. Lovejoy's Academy in Raleigh. In 1853 he edited The Spirit of the Age at Raleigh. Though admitted to the bar in 1858 he never practiced, his mind inclining him more to literary work than to law. In 1871-1872 he was State Librarian. In 1889 he was editor of The Century, a literary journal published at Florence, South Carolina. His place in literature, however, was won by his poetical writings.

Of the three volumes that came from his pen the first was 'Hesper and Other Poems,' published in Raleigh in 1861, being the first book issued under copyright of the Confederate States of America. A second edition, says Davidson, was printed in 1863. In 1869 his second volume appeared; it was entitled 'Poems,' and was published by Hurd and Houghton, New York. His third volume, 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' contains the best of his earlier and later work, and was published in 1883 by P. W. Wiley of Raleigh. The closing days of his life were spent upon the revision of his verse, but he passed away before the task was completed. He died in Raleigh, June 29, 1901.

While he claimed to blow only "a pipe of Carolina reed," yet from it issued inspiring strains. These lines from "The Poet's Afterthought" seem to express fairly both his aspiration and achievement:

"Loyal to thy nobler self,
Neither sing for praise nor pelf;
Seem to others what thou art—
Write thy poems from thy heart."

The distinctive mark of Mr. Hill's poetry is its religious tone. Seven of the poems in his latest volume appear under Scripture texts; several others are religious in both theme and sentiment; and almost every piece bears the stamp of a pious nature. Sometimes, indeed, he seems more the preacher than the poet; yet his lines are the out-breathing of a singularly reverent spirit. For illustration, note in "Passion Flower" the utter humility and devotion of the poet:

"Low at thy feet, O Christ, I fall.

Spurn not the spikenard which I bring.

Be thou from hence my all in all—

Anointed Prophet, Priest, and King."

"The Star Above the Manger" has become a recitation classic in his native State and the poet considered it his best piece of work. It gives scope to his descriptive and spiritual power while at the same time voicing in its closing stanza the lament:

"Lost—lost indeed his heart must be— His way how dark with danger— Whose hooded eye may never see The Star above the Manger."

In a Lenten meditation he extols the well-doer who is "Content to be nameless, Unportioned and lowly," and shrinks from the idea

"That we should deem Heaven
A close corporation,
And, pitiless, witness
A brother's damnation."

To him the hope of heaven is "an Ararat, eternal and sublime." A glimpse within the veil he claims "our laggard zeal would spur." And proceeding thitherward, he craves the unforsaking Presence:

"Then would our heart rejoice
However rough the way,
Till on our darkness dawns
The light of perfect day."

The poems of Mr. Hill are sprinkled with classic references. He takes us to the land of siren, nymph, and naiad; we hear again of Niobe, Memnon, Merope, and the sister Graces; once more "Arachne's loom" is heard, the "Sabean gales" blow, "Hybla's beds of thyme" flourish, "Diana's starry train" shines, and "Cimmerian gloom" gathers upon the scene.

Here and there also one comes upon charming phrase and vivid bits of imagination. We read of "tongueless terror," "the banian's bosky screen," "the pure pellucid wave," "the dreamy twilight," and "the blue inverted skies." The rose woos to "her musky bowers"; violets are "timid woodland graces," and dandelions are "floral Pleiades." The cross is "the tristful tree"; "will . . . is thought at work," and life is "a new kaleidoscope Revolving in the hands of Hope."

The prodigal is pictured as "a houseless alien" stung "with unlanguaged bitterness" by a love that lived through "the frenzy of despair." To "Stella" he sings of "the past that lies asleep in memory" and implores her to "bid hyacinthine hopes to bloom." In "Love Among the Roses" the drowsy bees are "drunken with perfume" and

"Zephyrs woo with plaintive sighs The hearts of hidden blooms."

Of Mr. Hill's descriptive verse, "The Sabbath of the Spring" presents some charming glimpses of "flowers rising from the dead":

"And bursting from their icy prison The golden buttercups are risen.

Aroused from their hibernal sleep The jacinth and the crocus leap Into the lap of Spring and bare Their scented bosoms to the air."

"An Ideal Siesta" is shaded by

"The clouds—Elysian isles that lie
In the bright blue sea of the summer sky."

"Sunset" and "A Vernal Reverie" also contain inspiring etchings of Nature.

The lyre of patriotism is infrequently touched and when it is, the reference is not so much to the State or the Nation as to the South. For example:

"Bowed with bleeding heart and eye of stone
The South, a nobler Niobe, appears,
Murmurs with quivering lips 'Thy will be done,'
And seeks relief from agony in tears."

Voicing the darker experiences of life, Mr. Hill has written no sweeter or tenderer verses than those entitled "Willie," which portray the sad memories and the becoming resignation of bereaved parenthood. In other poems we have a cry from the desert in the saddest of his lines; the vanity of all earthly things; but his unswerving confidence in the Right.

There is not the lilt in Mr. Hill's verse that is found in Boner's earlier work or Stockard's occasional pieces. Yet we come across bits of melody, as in these two selections from "St. Valentine's Day":

"Thanks to the sunshine,
Thanks to the showers;
They come again—bloom again—
Beautiful flowers."

"The mocking-bird, too—
The sweetest of mimes—
Is prodigal now
Of his jubilant rhymes."

Sometimes the poet resorts to a rather unwieldy vocabulary. Occasionally this appears in the headings which have to be looked up in the dictionary by the ordinary reader or translated from a foreign tongue by a scholar. Thus: "Dulcamara," "Anacreontic," "Perdite," "Ad Astra per Aspera," "Vicisti Me, Galileae." In "Darkness" we read of a "mournful introverted eye." It is Angela who is the type of "self-abnegating womanhood" and is free from "every sublunary care." In "Narcissus" we meet "eidolon" and "simulacra" and the isolated query,

"Who unravel opalescence In its very evanescence?"

And these lines:

"Ah Narcissus, the confusion—
Replication—involution—
Of those false and real glances Self-idolatry enhances."

In 'Living Writers of the South' (1869) Davidson characterized Mr. Hill's work up to that time as "full of fire, haste, and crudeness"; noted in "Violets" forty-two lines in one sentence; counted the appearances of jarring rhymes (though in some of these pronunciations the poet certainly had good authority); observed in no one poem a finished product; yet found "distinct evidences of genius" and declared one scene from "Taking a Snooze" to be "as graphic as Tennyson's famous simile and in that respect equal to it." Dr. Braxton Craven entertained a high opinion of Mr. Hill's verse and of one poem he wrote: "The 'Song of the Butterfly' is one of the finest poems of its kind in English literature." In the poet's later work there was perhaps more finish, range, and elevation; so that at the close of his career he had won a high place among the half-dozen best writers of verse in his native State. The heights of poetry he did not attain, but he rose to the up-reaching foothills; and while we listen to him in vain for the note of the nightingale, yet he sang his own song and sang it well.

THE STAR ABOVE THE MANGER

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883. All selections are used by kind permission of Miss Rosa Hill.

"And, lo, the star which they saw in the east, went before them till it came and stood over where the young child was."—St. Matthew vii, 9.

One night, while lowly shepherd swains
Their fleecy charge attended,
A light shone o'er Judea's plains
Unutterably splendid.

Far in the dusky Orient,
A star, unknown in story,
Arose to flood the firmament,
With more than morning glory.

The clustering constellations, erst
So gloriously gleaming,
Waned, when its sudden splendor burst
Upon their paler beaming;

And Heaven drew nearer Earth that night—Flung wide its pearly portals—Sent forth, from all its realms of light,
Its radiant immortals.

They hovered in the golden air,
Their golden censers swinging,
And woke the drowsy shepherds there
With their seraphic singing.

Yet Earth, to greet her gala day,
No jubilee was keeping;
Unconscious of the light, she lay,
In silent beauty, sleeping.

No more shall brightest cherubim,
And stateliest archangels,
Symphonious, sing such choral hymn—
Proclaim so sweet evangels;

No more appear that star at eve, Though glimpses of its glory Are seen by those who still believe The shepherd's simple story.

In Faith's clear firmament afar—
To Unbelief a stranger—
Forever glows the golden star
That stood above the manger.

Age after age may roll away, But on Time's rapid river The light of its celestial ray Shall never cease to quiver.

Frail barges, on the swelling tide,
Are drifting with the ages;
The skies grow dark—around each bark
A howling tempest rages!

Pale with affright, lost helmsmen steer,
While creaking timbers shiver;
The breakers roar—grim Death is near—
O who may now deliver!

Light—light from the Heraldic Star Breaks brightly o'er the billow; The storm, rebuked, is fled afar, The pilgrim seeks his pillow. Lost—lost indeed, his heart must be, His way how dark with danger— Whose hooded eye may never see The Star above the Manger!

WILLIE

Born January 16, 1863; died June 24, 1865. From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

The things he used to play with Lie in the corner there;
And yonder hangs the worsted cap
That he was wont to wear;
Beneath his dimpled chin I see
Its crimson tassels tied,
And clasp once more, with fond caress,
Our little boy that died.

I hear the restless, rosy feet
That patter on the stair,
And now he runs to mamma's seat,
To nestle fondly there:
He sits upon my knee again,
Or, on my foot astride,
I toss the darling of my heart,
Who clambers for a ride.

The labor of the day is done;
Home, to a glowing hearth,
I hasten, ere the set of sun,
The happiest man on earth;
A mother standing at the door,
Looks out, adown the street,
Elate with joy, as runs her boy,
His father first to greet.

Ah, then right merrily we romp!

And noisy is our glee,

For each, to please the household pet,

Must horse or driver be:

He brings "his blocks," and begs papa "A church" for him to rear, But knocks the fabric down before The steeple can appear.

His marbles next and then his ball,
Till, weary of our play,
He sups on mother's lap and folds
His little hands to pray;
And "Now I lay me down to sleep,"
That immemorial prayer,
In faltering phrases, soft and sweet,
Makes musical the air.

He sleeps; the fire is burning low,
And shadows on the wall,
Like those he wondered at, and feared,
Grotesquely rise and fall;
Night, rayless night, o'erwhelms my soul;
And yet in my despair,
I sometimes almost smile to think
There is no shadow there!

Tis summer-time again, and I
Sit mournfully for hours,
And watch the painted butterflies
That woo his favorite flowers;
They hover, unmolested, here,
Yet, dreaming of the chase,
I see the hunter's flashing eyes,
His flushed and eager face!

How oft I've seen the jocund boy
Return from garden-play,
His summer-hat, of plaited straw,
With larkspur blossoms gay!
The hand that decked it thus need not Renew the garland now,
For seraphim and cherubim
Twine amaranth for his brow!

Strange silence broods o'er all the house,
From dawn to close of day;
The little drummer beats no more Tattoo or reveillé;
His feathered cap and plaided cloak,
And broken drum remain,
But he who wore them once may ne'er
Come back to us again.

It almost breaks my heart to see
The dog he daily fed
Crouch at our feet, and mutely ask
The living for the dead;
I cannot harshly drive him out,
Though keener grief than mine
Wells forth afresh whene'er she hears
His wistful, piteous whine.

"But wouldst thou call him back to earth,
Have him again to wear
The crimson-tasseled worsted cap,
Upon his golden hair?
Wouldst have thine angel lay aside
His diadem of light,
Change crown for cross, and blindly grope,
Beside thee, through the night?"

"Ask me no more"; for flesh is weak;
Our idol was a part
Of every earth-born hope that blessed
Mine and his mother's heart!

"Ask me no more": help us, O God,
This bitter loss to bear,
To kiss Thy chastening rod, and live
To find "our treasure," there!

SONG OF THE BUTTERFLY

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

"What more felicity can fall to creature
Than to enjoy delight with liberty."

Spenser: "Fate of the Butterfly."

Ī.

"Who is merrier than I?"
Quoth the golden Butterfly;
"In the shining court of May,
Whose apparel half so gay?
I reflect each sparkling hue
Of her radiant retinue;
I have kissed the Lily's cheek;
I have played at 'hide and seek,'
Veilèd Violet, with you,
Who is merrier than I?"
Quoth the golden Butterfly.

II.

"I have flirted, too, with thee, Tremulous Anemone! And the blue-eyed Pimpernel, And the Canterbury-bell Are superlatively blest, Should I, for a moment, rest Down in yonder grassy dell: Little do they dream that I From their soft caresses fly, But to breathe the rare perfume Of the pale Magnolia bloom; Or to spend a listless hour. In the cool, secluded bower Of the pining Passion Flower! Blither wooer, who than I?" Quoth the gallant Butterfly.

III.

"When the shades of evening fall, Like the foldings of a pall: When the dew is on the flowers. And the mute, unconscious Hours Still pursue their noiseless flight, Through the dreamy realms of night: How delightful to recline On this crimson couch of mine! Zephyrs, languid with perfume. Gently rock my cradle-bloom: Glittering hosts of fire-flies Guard my slumbers from surprise. And Diana's starry train, Sweetly scintillant again, Never sleep while I repose On the petals of the rose! Who hath balmier bed than I?" Quoth the brilliant Butterfly.

IV.

"Life is but a summer day,
Gliding goldenly away;
Winter comes, alas! too soon—
Would it were forever June!
Yet, though brief my flight may be,
Fun and frolic still for me!
When the sisterhood of flowers,
Having had their gala-day,
In the chill autumnal showers,
Sorrowfully fade away,
Doomed to darkness and decay—
Who would not prefer to die;
What were life to such as I?"
Quoth the flaunting Butterfly.

DISENCHANTMENT

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

"The inventor of a spinning-jenny is pretty sure of his reward in his own day; but the writer of a true poem, like the apostle of a true religion, is nearly as sure of the contrary."—Carlyle.

"But he grew old—this knight so bold—
And o'er his heart a shadow
Fell as he found no spot of ground
That looked like El Dorado."—Edgar Allan Poe.

Poesy! thou art a fountain, In a dismal desert land, On a bleak and lonely mountain, High above the glowing sand:

At whose base, athirst and weary, I, a way-worn pilgrim, lie, Gazing out upon the dreary Torrid waste and brazen sky.

Hope, with promise of to-morrow, Gilds no more the rugged way; Disenchantment here, and sorrow Bivouac at the close of day.

Oft, upon my eager vision,
Beamed the mirage of the plain;
Green oases, fields Elysian,
Rose to fade away again:

Towering palm-trees grouped to shadow Living fountains, cool and clear; Murmurs, as of El Dorado, Faintly fell upon my ear:

Flushed with fever, weak and wasted,
Like the wretch who stoops to sip
Water, that for aye untasted,
Tempts, then flies his arid lip,

I drew near the lakes that shimmer In this wilderness accursed; They, receding, growing dimmer, Baffled still my burning thirst.

(Thus the nomads of Sahara Haply dream, all peril past, Other wells than those of Marah Will refresh their lips at last.)

Not for me, to scale the mountain, Kneel with the supernal throng, Drink of the Castalian fountain, Give the world undying song!

Feet of clay have here ascended, Mortals yet the path may trace; But my travail now is ended, This must be my resting-place.

I with Fate no longer quarrel, Dying, will no more repine, Lest another win the laurel I too fondly hoped to twine.

Nobler here, alone, to perish, Nameless seeker of a name, Than in sordid ease to cherish Simulated scorn of fame;

Though no earthly adulation
Crowd the minster, crown the urn,
There will be a coronation
Human eye may not discern;

An epiphany immortal
May for past eclipse atone;
Though at Death's unhonored portal
Stand no cenotaph of stone.

Honor waits on high endeavor, Holding high award in trust; Pledges to her seed forever, Resurrection from the dust!

ANACREONTIC

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

"I awoke the next morning with an aching head and feverish frame. Ah, those midnight carousals, how glorious they would be if there were no next morning!"—Pelham.

"An angel would be all the better for a good night's carouse in honest Moritz's wine-cellar; even to the ruffling of some of his feathers. What a sorry appearance, though, would the dreadful next morning bring!"—Kimball's St. Leger.

Fill up! fill up! The poison cup With Lethe to the brim: I yearn-I pine-I faint-I thirst To see the brilliant bubbles burst, Around its rosy rim: Then let me drain The bowl again, And fill it up once more; For fearful phantoms haunt my brain, And, at the open door, A ghastly group of fiends appear-Their hollow laughter racks my ear: See! how malignantly they leer Upon the wreck they've made; They little care that honor, wealth, And home, and happiness, and health, Are blighted and betrayed!

Fill up! fill up!
The sparkling cup;
It is with Lethe fraught!
It drowns reflection, palsies thought,
Binds memory in chains,
And bids the hot blood leap and dart,
Like molten lava from my heart,
To fire the sluggish veins!

Fill to the brim, and I will drink— "To Memory and Thought, Eternal Death."—For, O, to think Is with such horror fraught, That hell would be A heaven to me. Were Memory no more! Aye! could I never think again— Never the past deplore— I should no longer here remain; For hell can have no penal pain In all its fiery domain, So fearful unto me, As the scorpion-sting Of that terrible thing Which we call Memory!

To dream of all that I am now,
Of all I might have been;
The crown of thorns upon my brow,
The gnawing worm within—
Of all the treasures I have lost,
Like leaves autumnal, tempest-tost—
Of sunbeams into clouds withdrawn,
Their momentary sparkle gone—
Of murdered hope and blighted bloom—
O God! how terrible my doom!

Yet fill, fill up!
The crimson cup,
With frenzy to the brim!
I wildly burn—I madly thirst—
To see the blushing bubbles burst Around its ruby rim!

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

Hidden no longer
In moss-covered ledges,
Starring the wayside,
Under the hedges,
Violet, Pimpernel,
Flashing with dew,
Daisy and Asphodel
Blossom anew.

Down in the bosky dells
Everywhere,
Faintly their fairy bells
Chime in the air.
Thanks to the sunshine!
Thanks to the showers!
They come again, bloom again,
Beautiful flowers!

Twittering sparrows flit
Merrily by;
Skylarks triumphantly
Warble on high;
Echo, who slumbers
So long in the glen,
Awakens to mimic
The song of the wren:
For, thanks to the sunbeams!
Thanks to the showers!
They bud again, bloom again,
Beautiful flowers!

The mocking-bird, too,
The sweetest of mimes,
Is prodigal now
Of his jubilant rhymes!

And my heart is so light,
So cheery to-day,
I fancy I hear,
In his rapturous lay,
The music I dreamed
In those radiant hours,
When Love to my heart
(Like Spring to her bowers)
First came to awaken
Hope's beautiful flowers!

PROËMIAL STANZAS

From 'Passion Flower and Other Poems,' 1883.

If aught that I have ever said or sung
May cause one more memorial flower to bloom
Where plaintive harps, on Southern willows hung,
Wail, Memnon-like, amid perpetual gloom;

Where, bowed with bleeding heart and eye of stone, The South, a nobler Niobe, appears, Murmurs, with quivering lips, "Thy will be done!" And seeks relief from agony in tears;

If when her trembling hands, unclasped from prayer,
Begin the light of votive flowers to shed,
Exhaling sweets, illumining the air,
Above the graves of her Confederate dead,

She chance to touch and haply intertwine,
Mid flowers of balmier breath and happier hue,
A daisy or forget-me-not of mine,
That erst, unnoticed, by the wayside grew;

This, this would be far dearer than the meed Of praise awarded to the festive strain, Blown from a pipe of Carolina reed, Which, at your bidding, I awake again!

MOSES DRURY HOGE

[1818-1899]

WALTER W. MOORE

MOSES DRURY HOGE was born at Hempden-Sidney, Virginia, September 17, 1818, and died at Richmond, January 6, 1899. He was of Scotch and English descent. His grandfathers on both sides were ministers and college presidents. His father, also, and four of his uncles were ministers. So that he was emphatically of the tribe of Levi. Springing from this illustrious double line of ministers and educators, and reared at such a place as Hampden-Sidney, it is not surprising that he, too, should have become a minister and a shining exponent of liberal culture. He was educated at Hampden-Sidney College and Union Theological Seminary; in 1844 he came to Richmond, and here for fifty-four years he preached the gospel of the grace of God with a dignity and authority and tenderness, with a beauty and pathos and power, which have rarely, if ever, been surpassed in the annals of the American pulpit.

It was his privilege to preach to a larger number of the men whose commanding influence in public life, in the learned professions, or in the business world had conferred prosperity and honor upon the State, than any other spiritual teacher of the time. He was more frequently the spokesman of the people on great public occasions than any other man whom Richmond has delighted to honor. He was more frequently the subject of conversation in the social circle than any other member of this cosmopolitan community. His patriotic devotion to his people during the war and his far-reaching ministry to the soldiers endeared him still more to his countrymen. In 1862, when the blockade of the Southern States, incident to the Civil War, had cut off the South from a supply of Bibles, and when the great camps and hospitals in Virginia were filled with soldiers, thousands of whom it was certain would die on the field of battle, it became the most urgent Christian duty of the time to supply these men with copies of the Word of God. In this emergency Dr. Hoge undertook the extremely perilous enterprise of running the blockade both ways for the purpose of procuring in Great Britain and bringing into the Confederacy a supply of Bibles. His mission was successful beyond all expectations. In London he made a moving address to the British and Foreign Bible Society in regard to the needs of the soldiers, the effect of which was so great that when in conclusion he proposed to purchase on credit 10,000 Bibles and 25,000 Testaments, the Society, under the lead of his friend, the Earl of Shaftesbury, resolved to make him a free grant of 10,000 Bibles, 50,000 Testaments and 250,000 "Portions," that is, Psalms and Gospels. Some of the blockade-runners with this precious cargo of the Word of Life were captured, some were sunk, but about three-fourths of the books reached the Confederacy; and eternity alone can reveal the vast spiritual results of this unique service.

Dr. Hoge possessed distinctive endowments of body, mind and spirit for his work as a preacher. The physical features of his preaching were unique. When he rose in the pulpit, tall, straight, slender, sinewy, commanding, with something vital and electric in his resolute attitudes and movements, yet singularly deliberate; and with swarthy, grave, intellectual face and almost melancholy eyes, surveyed the people in front of him and then successively on either side before opening his lips, no one needed to be told that there stood a master of assemblies. The attention was riveted by his appearance and manner before he had uttered a word.

As soon as he began to speak, the clear, rich and resonant tones, reaching without effort to the limits of the largest assembly, revealed to every hearer another element of his power to move and mould the hearts of men. To few of the world's masters of discourse has it been given to demonstrate as he did the music and spell of the human voice. It was a voice in a million—flexible, magnetic, thrilling, clear as a clarion; by turns tranquil and soothing, strenuous and stirring, as the speaker willed; now mellow as a cathedral bell heard in the twilight, now ringing like a trumpet, or rolling through the building like melodious thunder, with an occasional impassioned crash like artillery, accompanied by a resounding stamp of his foot on the floor, but never unpleasant or uncontrolled or overstrained; no one ever heard him scream or tear his throat. Some of his cadences in the utterance of particular words or sentiments lingered in the ear and haunted the memory for years like a strain of exquisite music. As you listened to his voice in prayer, "there ran through its pathetic fall a vibration as though the minister's heart were singing like an Æolian harp as the breath of the spirit of God blew through its strings." It was a voice that adapted itself with equal felicity to all occasions. When he preached to the whole of General D. H. Hill's division in the open air, it rang like a bugle to the outermost verge of his vast congregation. When he stood on the slope of Mount Ebal in Palestine and recited the Twenty-third Psalm, it was heard distinctly by the English clergyman on the other side of the valley, three-quarters of a mile away. When the body of an eminent statesman and ruling elder in his church was borne into the building and laid before the pulpit, and the preacher rose and said, "Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace," the sympathetic intonations fell like healing balm on wounded hearts. When he stood in the Senate Chamber at Washington beside the mortal remains of the great Carolinian, and quoted to the assembled representatives of the greatness of this nation and of the world, Bossuet's solemn declaration, "There is nothing great but God," the voice and the words alike impressed the insignificance of all human concerns as compared with religion. When he stood in the chancel of St. Paul's, at Richmond, and stretched his hand over the casket containing the pallid form of "the daughter of the Confederacy," and said, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," it had the authority and tenderness of a prophet's benediction.

Of the intellectual qualities of his preaching the first that impressed the hearer was the exquisite phrasing. He was a marvelous magician with words. His native gift of expression had been enriched and chastened by the diligent study of the world's best books. Every cultivated person recognized the flavor of ripe scholarship in his diction, and even those devoid of culture felt its charm without being able to define it. The mellow splendor of his rhetoric captivated all classes of hearers. This rare beauty of his language, this exquisite drapery of his thoughts, might have tempted a superficial hearer to regard him as merely a skilful phrase-maker. It would have been a great error. He was a superb rhetorician largely because he was a true scholar and a profound theologian. His rhetoric drew deep. He was no encyclopedia preacher. His style had background. He deserved the tribute which Cecil paid to Sir Walter Raleigh, "He could toil terribly." All his life long he was a student—a student of books, a student of men, a student of the deep things of God. When men beheld the external splendor of the temple at Jerusalem, with its walls and roofs of white marble, surmounted with plates and spikes of glittering gold, they sometimes forgot the immense substructures built deep into the ground and resting upon everlasting rock; but, without that cyclopean masonry hidden from view, those snowy walls of marble and those skypiercing pinnacles of gold could not have been. Dr. Hoge's surpassing beauty of statement was bottomed on strong and wide knowledge of truth.

When spoken to by his friends in regard to the fulness and accuracy of his knowledge, the grace and vigor of his literary style, and the apparent ease with which he met all sorts of demands and rose to all sorts of emergencies, he invariably deprecated the idea that his readiness and adequacy were the result of any special gift, and insisted that the explanation lay rather in the fact that throughout his life he had been an indefatigable student. From his childhood to the end of his long and busy career he was a reader of books, not at random and for mere amusement, but carefully, thoughtfully, and for the purpose of storing his mind with noble thoughts and beautiful images. It was this life-long studiousness that gave his sermons their rare fulness of matter and their rare distinction of style. In addition to this general preparation by years of industrious and discriminating reading, he made careful and thorough special preparation for every discourse. Being thus a constantly growing student, he was always a fresh and interesting preacher. He told a friend that he even prepared addresses for all sorts of special public occasions, and fixed them in his memory, not always the language, but the line of thought and the illustrations, so that, as he modestly added, when suddenly called on he "generally had something to say."

He wrote much and always with care, making everything to which he set his pen contribute to the precision and elegance of his style. Even his personal letters and notes on matters of minor importance were characterized by such finish that they could have been printed without revision. He never allowed himself to write crude or slipshod communications of any kind. In the preparation of his sermons he was concerned chiefly with the matter rather than the language, but there were special passages in nearly every discourse which were written and rewritten with the utmost care. On rare occasions the whole sermon was written out and virtually committed to memory, and on at least one occasion I heard him read a sermon; but, as in the case of Chalmers, it was "fell reading." Ordinarily, however, he used no manuscript or notes. One feature of his preparation for his pulpit duties must be particularly mentioned, viz., his habit of writing prayers. He expended a great deal of toil on his public prayers. He wrote hundreds of them with the greatest care. They were not memorized, but the result was seen in the range and propriety and elevation of his petitions when leading the devotions of his people. His services were never subject to the reproach which so often lies against this part of the service in those denominations which prefer the method of free prayers as distinguished from the fixed liturgy. I have never heard any minister whose prayers so lifted and rested and comforted his people.

Dr. Hoge, then, was not only an orator but a teacher. His sermons were not only brilliant in form, but rich in truth. So that not only in point of finish, but also in point of force, he ranks with the masters of the contemporary pulpit. It is true that many of his later discourses were somewhat discursive in treatment, necessarily so because of the innumerable demands upon his time after he reached the zenith of his fame; but he never failed to bring beaten oil to the sanctuary when it was possible, and he never for a moment relinquished or lowered his conception of the teaching function of the ministry. His people were not only interested and entertained, but they were fed and nourished with truth. His substantial attainments were no less remarkable than his graces of speech. He was indeed an imperial rhetorician, with a wonderful wealth of diction, a phenomenal power of description, and a rare felicity of illustration; but rhetoric in the pulpit has no abiding charm apart from truth. Strong men and thoughtful women do not sit for fifty-four years in ever-increasing numbers under a ministry which has not in it the strength of divine truth, deeply studied, sincerely believed, and earnestly proclaimed. The lecture which he delivered at the University of Virginia, fifty-five years ago, on "The Success of Christianity an Evidence of its Divine Origin" and published in the volume entitled 'Evidences of Christianity,' is a good specimen of the kind of work he was capable of when at his best as a young man. Perhaps the noblest oration of his later life was his address at the unveiling of the statue of Stonewall Jackson, presented by English gentlemen to the State of Virginia, and now located in the Capitol Square at Richmond. This is printed with many of his other public addresses and prayers in the appendix to the admirable 'Life of Dr. Hoge,' recently published by his nephew, the Rev. Peyton H. Hoge, D.D. (Presbyterian Committee of Publications, Richmond, Virginia).

STONEWALL JACKSON

Delivered at the Unveiling of the Statue of Stonewall Jackson, in the Capitol Square, Richmond, Virginia, October 26, 1876.

Selection from 'Life of Dr. Hoge.' Copyright by Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Virginia. By kind permission of the publishers.

Were I permitted at this moment to consult my own wishes, I would bid the thunder of the cannon and the acclamations of the people announce the unveiling of the statue; and then, when with hearts beating with commingled emotions of love and grief and admiration, we had contemplated this last and noblest creation of the great sculptor, the ceremonies of this august hour should end.

In attempting to commence my oration, I am forcibly reminded of the faltering words with which Bossuet began his splendid eulogy of the Prince of Condé. Said he: "At the moment I open my lips to celebrate the immortal glory of the Prince of Condé, I find myself equally overwhelmed by the greatness of the theme and the needlessness of the task. What part of the habitable world has not heard of his victories and the wonders of his life? Everywhere they are rehearsed. His own countrymen in extolling them can give no information even to the stranger. And although I may remind you of them, yet everything I could say would be anticipated by your thoughts, and I should suffer the reproach of falling far below them."

How true is all this to-day! Not only is every important event in the life of our illustrious chieftain familiar to you all, but what lesson to be derived from his example has not already been impressively enforced by those whose genius, patriotism and piety have qualified them to speak in terms worthy of their noble theme? And now that the statesman and soldier, who well represents the honor of Virginia as its chief magistrate, has given his warm and earnest welcome to our distinguished guests from other states and from other lands who grace this occasion by their presence, I would not venture to proceed, had not the Commonwealth laid on me its command to utter some words of greeting to my fellow-countrymen, who this day do honor to themselves in rendering homage to the memory of Virginia's illustrious son.

I cannot repress an emotion of awe as I vainly attempt to overlook the mighty throng, extending as it does beyond the limits of these Capitol grounds, and covering spaces which cannot be reached by the eye of the speaker. More impressive is this assemblage of citizens and representatives from all parts of our own and of foreign lands, than ever gathered on the banks of the ancient Alpheus at one of the solemnities which united the men of all the Grecian states and attracted strangers from the most distant countries. There was indeed one pleasing feature in the old Hellenic festivals. entire territory around Olympia was consecrated to peace during their celebration, and there even enemies might meet as friends and brothers, and in harmony rejoice in their ancestral glories and national renown. It is so with us to-day. But how deficient in moral interest was the old Olympiad, and how wanting in one feature which gives grace to our solemnity. No citizen, no stranger, however honored, was permitted to bring with him either mother, wife, or daughter; but here today how many of the noble women of the land, of whom the fabled Alcestis, Antigone, and Iphigenia were but the imperfect types, lend the charm of their presence to the scene -Christian women of a nobler civilization than Pagan antiquity ever knew.

We have come from the seashore, the mountains, and the valleys of our Southland, not only to inaugurate a statue, but a new era in our history. Here on this Capitoline Hill, on this twenty-sixth day of October, 1876, and in the one hundredth vear of the Commonwealth of Virginia, in sight of that historic river that more than two centuries and a half ago bore on its bosom the bark freighted with the civilization of the North American Continent, on whose banks Powhatan wielded his sceptre and Pocahontas launched her skiff, under the shadow of that Capitol whose foundations were laid before the present Federal Constitution was framed, and from which the edicts of Virginia went forth over her realm that stretched from the Atlantic to the Mississippi-edicts framed by some of the patriots whose manly forms on yonder monument still gather around him whose name is the purest in human history—we have met to inaugurate a new Pantheon to the glory of our common mother,

In the story of the empires of the earth some crisis often occurs which develops the genius of the era and impresses an imperishable stamp on the character of a whole people. Such a crisis was the Revolution of 1776, when thirteen thinly-settled and widely-separated colonies dared to offer the gage of battle to the greatest military and naval power on the globe.

The story of that struggle is the most familiar in American annals. After innumerable reverses, and incredible sufferings and sacrifices, our fathers came forth from the ordeal victorious. And though during the progress of the strife, before calm reflection had quieted the violence of inflamed passion, they were branded by opprobrious names and their revolt denounced as rebellion and treason, the justice of their cause, and the wisdom, the valor and the determination with which they vindicated it, were quickly recognized and generously acknowledged by the bravest and purest of British soldiers and statesmen; so that now, when we seek the noblest eulogies of the founders of American republicanism, we find them in the writings of the essayists and historians of the mother-country. We honor ourselves and do homage to virtue when we hallow the names of those who in the council and in the field achieved such victories. We bequeath an influence which will bless coming generations, when with the brush and the chisel we perpetuate the images of our fathers and the founders of the State. Already has the noble office been begun. Here on this hill the forms of Washington, and Henry, and Lewis, and Mason, and Nelson, and Jefferson, and Marshall, arrest our eyes and make their silent but salutary and stirring appeals to our hearts. Nor are these all who merit eternal commemoration. As I look on that monument, I miss James Madison and others of venerable and illustrious name. Let us not cease our patriotic work until we have reared a Pantheon worthy of the undying glory of the past.

But this day we inaugurate a new era. We lay the corner-stone of a new Pantheon in commemoration of our country's fame. We come to honor the memory of one who was the impersonation of our Confederate cause, and whose genius illuminated the great contest which has recently ended, and which made an epoch not only in our own history, but in that of the age.

We assert no monopoly in the glory of that leader. It was his happy lot to command, even while he lived, the respect and admiration of right-minded and right-hearted men in every part of this land, and in all lands. It is now his rare distinction to receive the homage of those who most differed with him on the questions which lately rent this republic in twain from ocean to ocean. From the North and from the South, from the East and from the West, men have gathered on these grounds to-day, widely divergent in their views on social, political and religious topics; and yet they find in the attraction which concentrates their regard upon one name, a place where their hearts unexpectedly touch each other and beat in strange unison.

It was this attractive moral excellence which, winning the love and admiration of the brave and pure on the other side of the sea, prompted them to enlist the genius of one of the greatest of modern sculptors in fashioning the statue we have met to inaugurate this day.

It is a singular and striking illustration of the world-wide appreciation of his character that the first statue of Jackson comes from abroad, and that while the monument to our own Washington, and the effigies of those who surround him, were erected by order of the Commonwealth, this memorial is the tribute of the admiration and love of those who never saw his face, and who were bound to him by no ties save those which a common sympathy for exalted worth establishes between the souls of magnanimous and heroic men. We accept this noble gift all the more gratefully because it comes from men of kindred race and kindred heart, as the expression of their goodwill and sympathy for our people as well as of their admiration for the genius and character of our illustrious hero.

We accept it as the visible symbol of the ancient friendship which existed in colonial times between Virginia and the mother-country. We accept it as a prophecy of the incoming of British settlers to our sparsely-populated territory, and hail it as a pleasing omen for the future that the rebuilding of our shattered fortunes should be aided by the descendants of the men who laid the foundations of this Commonwealth. We accept it as a pledge of the peaceful relations which we trust will ever exist between Great Britain and the confederated empire formed by the United States of America.

In the first memorial discourse that was delivered after his lamented death, the question was asked, "How did it happen that a man who so recently was known to but a small circle, and to them only as a laborious, punctilious, humble-minded professor in a military institute, in so brief a space of time gathered around his name so much of the glory which encircles the name of Napoleon, and so much of the love that enshrines the memory of Washington?" And soon after, in the memoir which will go down to coming generations as the most faithful portraiture of its subject and an enduring monument of the genius of its author, the inquiry was resumed, "How is it that this man, of all others least accustomed to exercise his own fancy or address that of others, has stimulated the imagination not only of his own countrymen, but that of the civilized world? How has he, the most unromantic of great men, become the hero of a living romance, the ideal of an inflamed fancy, even before his life has been invested with the mystery of distance?" From that day to this these inquiries have been propounded in every variety of form, and with an ever-increasing interest.

To answer these questions will be one object of this discourse; and yet the public will not expect me, in so doing, to furnish a new delineation of the life of Jackson or a rehearsal of the story of his campaigns. Time does not permit this, neither does the occasion demand it. By a brief series of ascending propositions do I seek to furnish the solution. I find an explanation of the regard in which the memory of Tackson is cherished—

First—In the fact that he was the incarnation of those heroic qualities which fit their possessor to lead and command men, and which, therefore, always attract the admiration, kindle the imagination and arouse the enthusiasm of the people.

There is a natural element in humanity which constrains it to honor that which is strong, and adventurous, and indomitable. Decision, fortitude, inflexibility, intrepidity, determination, when consecrated to noble ends, and especially when associated with a gentleness which throws a softened charm over these sterner attributes, ever win and lead captive the popular heart.

The masses who compose the commonalty, consciously weak and irresolute, instinctively gather around the men of loftier stature, in whom they find the great forces wanting in themselves, and spontaneously follow the call of those whom they think competent to redress their wrongs and vindicate their rights.

These are the leaders who are welcomed by the people with open arms, and elevated to the high places of the earth, to become the regents of society—to develop the history of the age in which they live, and to impress upon it the noble image of their own personality.

As discoverers love to trace great rivers to their sources, so in our studies of the characters of those who have filled large spaces in the public eye, it interests us to go backward in search of the rudimentary germs which afterwards developed into the great qualities which commanded the admiration of the world.

Never was the adage, "the child is the father of the man," more strikingly illustrated than in the early history of the orphan boy whose name subsequently became a tower of strength to the armies he commanded, and to the eleven sovereign states banded and battling together for a separate national life.

There is no more graphic picture in the pages of Macaulay than that of Warren Hastings, at the age of seven, lying on the bank of a rivulet which flowed through the broad lands which were once the property of his ancestors, and there forming the resolve that all that domain should one day be his, and never abandoning his purpose through all the vicissitudes of his stormy life, until, as the "Hastings of Daylesford," he tasted a joy which his heart never knew in the command of the millions over whom he ruled in the Indian empire.

But stranger still was it to see a pensive, delicate orphanchild of the same age, the inheritor of a feeble constitution, yet with a will even more indomitable than that of Warren Hastings, renouncing his home with a relative who, mistaking his disposition, had attempted to govern him by force, and alone and on foot performing a journey of eighteen miles to the house of another kinsman, where he suddenly presented himself, announcing his unalterable resolve never to return to his former home—a decision which no remonstrances or persuasions could induce him to revoke; and stranger still to see him, the year after, on a lonely island of the Mississippi River, in company with another child a few years his senior, maintaining himself by his own labor, until driven by malaria from the desolate spot where, beneath the dreary forests and beside the angry floods of the father of waters, he had displayed the self-reliance and hardihood of a man, at a period of life when children are ordinarily scarcely out of the nursery. This inflexibility of purpose and defiance of hardship and danger in the determination to succeed was displayed in all his subsequent career—whether we see him at West Point, overcoming the disadvantages of a deficient preliminary education by a severity of application almost unparalleled, in accordance with the motto he inscribed in bold characters on a page in his common-place book, "You may be whatever you resolve to be"or whether we follow him through the Mexican campaign, winning his first laurels at Cherubusco, and at Chapultepec, where he received his second promotion—or whether we accompany him to his quiet retreat in Lexington, where, after the termination of the Mexican War, he filled the post of professor in the Military Institute, and there affording a new exhibition of his determination in overcoming obstacles more formidable than those encountered in the field, in the persistent discharge of every duty in spite of feeble health and threatened loss of sight.

I know of no picture in his life more impressive than that which presents him as he sat in his study during the still hours of the night, unable to use book or lamp—with only a mental view of diagrams and models, and the artificial signs required in abstruse calculations, holding long and intricate processes of mathematical reasoning with the steady grasp of thought, his face turned to the blank, dark wall, until he mastered every difficulty and made complete preparations for the instructions of the succeeding day.

These years of self-discipline and self-enforced severity of regimen, maintained with rigid austerity through years of seclusion from public life, constituted the propitious season for the full maturing of those faculties whose energy was so soon to be displayed on a field which attracted the attention of the world.

When his native state, which had long stood in the attitude of magnanimous mediation between the hostile sections, in the hope of preserving the Union which she had assisted in forming, and to whose glory she had made such contributions, was menaced by the rod of coercion, and compelled to decide between submission or separation, then Jackson, who would have cheerfully laid down his life to avert the disruption, in accordance with the principles of the political school in which he had been trained, and which commanded his conscientious assent, hesitated no longer, but went straight to his decision as the beam of light goes from its God to the object it illumines. Simultaneously with the striking of the clock which announced the hour of his departure with his cadets for the Camp of Instruction of this city, the command to march was given. Never was there a home dearer than his own; but he left it, never again to cross its threshold. From that time. as we are told, he never asked nor received a furlough—was never absent from duty for a day, whether sick or well, and never slept one night outside the lines of his own command. And passing over a thousand occasions which the war afforded for the exercise of his unconquerable will, there is something impressive in the fact that the very last order which ever fell from his lips was a revelation of its unabated force. After he had received his fatal wound, while pale with anguish and faint with loss of blood, he was informed by one of his generals that the men under his command had been thrown into such confusion that he feared he could not hold his ground, the voice which was growing tremulous and low, thrilled the heart of that officer with the old authoritative tone. as he uttered his final order, "General, you must keep your men together and hold your ground."

These were the elements which shaped Jackson's distinctive characteristics as a soldier and commander which may be most concisely stated; a natural genius for the art of war, without which no professional training will ever develop the highest order of military talent; a power of abstraction and self-concentration which enabled him to determine every proper combination and disposition of his forces, without the slightest mental confusion—even in those supreme moments when his face and form underwent a sort of transfiguration amid the flame and thunder of battle; a conviction of the moral superiority of aggressive over defensive warfare in elevating the courage of his own men and in depressing that of the enemy; an almost intuitive insight into the plans of the enemy, and an immediate perception of the time to strike the most stunning blow, from the most unlooked-for quarter; a conviction of the necessity of following every such blow with another, and more terrible, so as to make every success a victory, and every victory so complete as to compel the speedy termination of the war.

In the county where all that is mortal of this great hero sleeps, there is a natural bridge of rock whose massive arch, fashioned with grace by the hand of God, springs lightly toward the sky, spanning a chasm into whose awful depth the beholder looks down bewildered and awe-struck. That bridge is among the cliffs what Niagara is among the waters—a visible expression of sublimity, a glimpse of God's great strength and power.

But its grandeur is not diminished because tender vines clamber over its gigantic piers, or because sweet-scented flowers nestle in its crevices and warmly color its cold gray columns. Nor is the granite strength of our dead chieftain's character weakened because in every throb of his heart there was a pulsation so ineffably and exquisitely tender as to liken him, even amidst the horrors of war, to the altar of pity which ancient mythology reared among the shrines of strong and avenging deities.

This admirable commingling of strength and tenderness in his nature is touchingly illustrated by a letter, now for the first time made public.

An officer under his command had obtained leave of absence to visit a stricken household. A beloved member of his family had just died, another was seriously ill, and he applied for an extension of his furlough. This is the reply:

My dear Major: I have received your sad letter, and wish I could relieve your sorrowing heart, but human aid cannot heal the wound.

From me you have a friend's sympathy, and I wish the suffering condition of our country permitted me to show it. But we must think of the living and of those who are to come after us, and see that, with God's blessing, we transmit to them the freedom we have enjoyed. What is life without honor? Degradation is worse than death. It is necessary that you should be at your post immediately. Join me to-morrow morning.

Your sympathizing friend,

THOMAS J. JACKSON.

Not only was he sensitive to every touch of human sorrow, but no man was ever more susceptible to impressions from the physical world. The hum of bees, the fragrance of clover fields, the tender streaks of dawn, the dewy brightness of the early spring, the mellow glories of matured autumn, all by turns charmed and tranquillized him. The eye that so often sent its lightning through the smoke of battle grew soft in contemplating the beauty of a flower. The ear that thrilled with the thunder of the cannonade drank in with innocent delight the song of birds and the prattle of children's voices. The hand which guided the rush of battle on the plains of Manassas and the Malvern Hills was equally ready to adjust the covering around the tender frame of a motherless babe, when at midnight he rose to see if it was comfortable and warm, though its own father was a guest under his roof. The voice whose sharp and ringing tones had so often uttered the command, "Give them the bayonet!" culled even from foreign tongues terms of endearment for those he loved, which his own language did not adequately supply; and the man who filled two hemispheres with the story of his fame was never so happy as when he was telling the colored children of his Sunday school the story of the Cross.

Second—Another explanation of the universal regard with which his memory is hallowed conducts to a higher plane, and enables us to contemplate a still nobler phase of his character. His was the greatness which comes without being sought for its own sake—the unconscious greatness which results from self-sacrifice and supreme devotion to duty. Duty is an altar from which a vestal flame is ever ascending to the skies, and he who stands nearest that flame catches most of its radiance, and in that light is himself made luminous forever.

The day after the first battle of Manassas, and before the history of that victory had reached Lexington in authentic form, rumor, preceding any accurate account of that event, had gathered a crowd around the postoffice awaiting with intensest interest the opening of the mail. In its distribution the first letter was handed to the Rev. Dr. White. It was from General Jackson. Recognizing at a glance the well-known superscription, the doctor exclaimed to those around him "Now we shall know all the facts!"

This was the bulletin:

My Dear Pastor: In my tent last night, after a fatiguing day's service, I remembered that I had failed to send you my contribution for our colored Sunday school. Enclosed you will find my check for that object, which please acknowledge at your earliest convenience, and oblige

Yours faithfully,

THOS. J. JACKSON.

Not a word about a conflict which electrified a nation! Not an allusion to the splendid part he had taken in it; not a reference to himself beyond the fact that it had been a fatiguing day's service. And yet that was the day ever memorable in his history—memorable in all history—when he received the name which is destined to supplant the name his parents gave him—Stonewall Jackson. When his brigade of twenty-six hundred men had for hours withstood the iron tempest which broke upon it without causing a waver in its line, and when, on his right, the forces under the command of the gallant General Bee had been overwhelmed in the rush of resistless numbers, then was it that the event occurred which cannot be more graphically described than in the burning words of his biographer:

"It was then that Bee rode up to Jackson, and, with despairing bitterness, exclaimed, 'General, they are beating us back.' 'Then,' said Jackson, calm and curt, 'we will give them the bayonet.' Bee seemed to catch the inspiration of his determined will, and, galloping back to the broken fragments of his overtaxed command, exclaimed, 'There is Jackson standing like a stone wall. Rally behind the Virginians!' At this trumpet-call a few score of his men reformed their ranks.

Placing himself at the head, he charged the dense mass of the enemy, and in a moment fell dead with his face to the foe. From that time Jackson's was known as the Stonewall Brigade—a name henceforth immortal and belonging to all the ages; for the christening was baptized in the blood of its author; and that wall of brave hearts was on every battlefield a steadfast bulwark of their country."

The letter written to his pastor in Lexington on the day following that battle gives the key-note to his character. Nor on any occasion was he the herald of his own fame; never, save by the conscientious discharge of duty, did he aid in the dissemination of that fame. Never did he perform an act for the sake of what men might say of it; and while he felt all the respect for public opinion to which it is justly entitled, he was not thinking of what the public verdict might be, but of what it was right to do. The attainment of no personal ends could satisfy aspirations like his. To ascertain what was true, to do what was best, to fill up the narrow measure of life with the largest possible usefulness, was his single-hearted purpose. In such a career, if enjoyment should come, or well-earned fame, or augmented influence, or the power which accompanies promotion, they must all come as incidents by the way, as satellites which gather around a central orb, and not as the consummation toward which he ever tended. This singleness of aim was inseparable from a soul so sincere. A nature like his was incapable of employing the meretricious aids by which some men seek to heighten or advance their reputation.

Hence he never affected mystery. His reticence was not the assumption of impenetrability of purpose. His reserve was not the artifice of one who seeks to awe by making himself unapproachable. He hedged himself about with no barrier of exclusiveness. He assumed no airs of portentous dignity. He studied no dramatic effects. On the field, so far from condescending to those histrionic displays of person, or theatrical arts of speech, by which some commanders have sought to excite the enthusiasm of their armies, when his troops caught the sight of his faded uniform and sunburnt cap, and shook the air with their shouts as he rode along the lines, he quickened his gallop and escaped from view. When among the mountain pyramids, older than those to which the first Napoleon pointed, he did not remind his men that the centuries were looking down on them. When on the plain, he drilled no eagles to perch on his banners, as the third Napoleon was said to have done. But one thing he did, he impressed his men with such an intense conviction of his unselfish and supreme consecration to the cause for which he had periled all, and so kindled them with his own magnetic fire as to fuse them into one articulated body—one heart throbbing through all the members, one spirit animating the entire frame—that heart, that spirit, his own. It was his sublime indifference to personal danger, to personal comfort and personal aggrandizement, that gave him such power over the armies he commanded, and such a place in the hearts of the people of the Confederate States.

The true test of attachment to any cause is what one is willing to suffer for its advancement, and it is the spectacle of disinterested devotion to the right and true at the cost of toil, and travail, and blood, if need be, that captivates the popular heart and calls forth its admiration and sweetest affection. He who exhibits most of this spirit is the man who unconsciously wins for himself enduring fame. When he passes from earth to a higher and diviner sphere his influence does not perish. It is not the transient brilliance of the meteor, but the calm radiance of a star, whose light, undimmed and undiminished, comes down to kindle all true and brave souls through immeasurable time. Exalted by the disinterested works he has wrought, by his example he elevates others, and thus becomes the trellis, strong and high, on which other souls may stretch themselves in the pursuit of whatsoever is excellent in human character and achievement.

Such a man was Jackson. Such is the recognition of him beyond the sea, of which this statue is a token. Such is our appreciation of his claim upon our gratitude, upon our undying love, in testimony of which we gather around this statue to-day and crown it with the laurel, first moistened by our tears.

Third—But this universal sentiment of regard for his memory rests upon foundations which lie still deeper in the human heart. At the mention of his name another idea inseparably associated with it invariably asserts its place in the mental portraiture which all men acquainted with his history have formed of him; and so I announce as the third and last explanation of the homage awarded him, the sincerity, the purity, and the elevation of his character as a servant of the Most High God.

No one acquainted with the moral history of the world can for a moment doubt that religious veneration is at once the profoundest and most universal of human instincts; and however individual men may chafe at the restraints which piety imposes, or be indifferent to its obligations, yet there is a sentiment in the popular heart which compels its homage for those whose character and lives most faithfully reflect the beauty of the Divine Image.

When a man already eminent by great virtues and services attains great eminence in piety and wears the coronal of heaven on his brow, because the spirit of heaven has found its home in his heart, then the world, involuntarily, or with hearty readiness, places him on a higher pedestal, because, with their love and admiration for the attractive qualities of the man, there is mingled a veneration for the ennobling graces of the Christian.

I do not agree with those who ascribe all that was admirable in the character of Jackson, and all that was splendid in his career, to his religious faith. He was distinguished before faith became an element in his life; and even after his faith attained its fullest development, it did not secure the triumph of the cause to which his life was a sacrifice.

But this I say, that his piety heightened every virtue, gave direction and force to every blow struck for that cause, and then consecration to the sacrifice when he laid down his life on the altar of his country's liberties. He was purer, stronger, more courageous, more efficient, because of his piety; purer, because penitence strains the soul of corruptions which defile it; stronger, because faith nerves the arm that takes hold on Omnipotence; more courageous, because hope gives exaltation to the heroism of one who fights with the crown of life ever in view; more efficient, because religion, which is but another name for the right use of one's own faculties, preserves them all in harmonious balance, develops all in symmetrical proportion, and by freeing them from the warping power of prejudice, the blinding power of passion, and the debasing slavery of evil habits, gives them all wholesome exercise, trains them all to keep step to the music of duty, and inspires them with an energy which is both intense and rightly directed.

It was thus that he gave to the world an illustration of the power which results from the union of the loftiest human attributes and unfaltering faith in God.

To attempt, therefore, to portray the life of Jackson while leaving out the religious element, would be like undertaking "to describe Switzerland without making mention of the Alps," or to explain the fertility of the land of the Pharaohs without taking into account the enriching Nile.

If what comes from the speaker to-day on this subject loses aught of its force because it is regarded as professional, he will deeply regret it. The same testimony might have more weight from the lips of many a statesman or soldier on these grounds to-day, but it would not be a whit more true. Sturdy old Thomas Carlyle, at all events, was not speaking professionally when he said: "A man's religion is the chief fact with regard to him." "The thing a man does practically lay to heart concerning his vital relation to this mysterious universe, and his duty and destiny there, that is in all cases the primary thing for him, and determines all the rest."

It was surely the primary fact, the supreme fact in the history of General Jackson, and I cannot leave the subject without adding that those who confound his faith in Providence with fatalism mistake both the spiritual history of the man and the meaning of the very words they employ.

Those who imagine that his faith savored of bigotry do not know that one characteristic of his religion was its generous catholicity, as might well be inferred from the fact that the first spiritual guides whose instructions he sought were members of communions widely different in doctrine and polity; that when he connected himself with the church of his choice, it was with doubts of the truth of some of its articles of doctrine—doubts ultimately and utterly removed, indeed, but openly avowed while they possessed him; that nothing so rejoiced his heart during the progress of the war as the harmony existing between the various denominations represented in the Army; that in selecting his personal staff, and in recommending men for promotion, merit was the sole ground, and their ecclesiastical relations were never even considered; that with a charity which embraced all who held the cardinal truths of revelation, he ardently desired such a unity of feeling and concert of action among all the followers of the same Divine Leader as would constitute one spiritual army, glorious and invincible.

It is refreshing, too, to note, that at this day, when political economists abandon the weaker races to the law of natural selection, and contemplate with complacency the process by which the dominant races extirpate the less capable, he sought to place the gentle but strong and sustaining hand of Christianity beneath the African population of the South, and so arrest the operation of that law by developing them, if possible, into a self-sustaining people.

It is still more refreshing to note, that at this day, when scientific men assert such an unvarying uniformity in the operations of the laws of Nature as to discredit prophecy and deny miracle and silence prayer, that he whose studies had lain almost exclusively in the realm of the exact sciences was a firm believer in the supernatural. Well did this humble pupil in the school of the Great Teacher—this diligent student in the school of physical science—know that true progress was not mere advance in inventions and in arts, or in subsidizing the forces of Nature to human uses, but that true progress was the progress of man himself-man, as distinct from anything external to himself. Well did he know that there is a celestial as well as a terrestial side to man's nature, and that although the temple of the body has its foundation in the dust, it is a temple covered by a dome which opens upward to the air and the sunlight of heaven, through which the Creator discloses Himself as the goal of the soul's aspirations, as the ultimate and imperishable good which satisfies its infinite desires. true and brave words of the British Premier when he said, "Society has a soul as well as a body; the traditions of a nation are a part of its existence; its valor and its discipline, its religious faith, its venerable laws, its science and its erudition. its poetry, its art, its eloquence and its scholarship, are as much a portion of its existence as its agriculture, its commerce, and its engineering skill."

The death of every soldier who fell in our Confederate war is a protest against that base philosophy "which would make physical good man's highest good, and which would attempt to rear a noble commonwealth on mere material foundations." Every soldier who offers his life to his country demonstrates the superiority of the moral to the physical, and proclaims that truth, and right, and honor, and liberty are nobler than animal existence, and worth the sacrifice even when blood is the offering.

And now we recognize the Providence of God in giving to this faithful servant the illustrious name and fame as a leader of armies, which brought the very highest development of his character to the notice of the world. It was his renown as a soldier of the country which made him known to men as a soldier of the Cross. And since nothing so captivates the popular heart or so kindles its enthusiasm as military glory, Providence has made even that subservient to a higher purpose. Men cannot now think of Jackson without associating the prowess of the soldier with the piety of the man. Thus his great military renown is the golden candlestick holding high the celestial light which is seen from afar and cannot be hid.

Such was the man who was second in command in our Confederate armies, and whose success as a leader during the bright, brief career allotted to him was second to that of no one of his illustrious comrades-in-arms.

And yet the cause to which all this valor was consecrated, and for which all these sacrifices were made, was not destined to triumph. And here, perhaps, we learn one of the most salutary lessons of this wonderful history.

Doubtless all men who have ever given their labors and affection to any cause fervently hope to be the witnesses of its assured triumph. Nor do I deny that success makes the pulses of enterprise beat faster and fuller. Like the touch of the goddess, it transforms the still marble into breathing life. But yet all history, sacred and profane, is filled with illustrations of the truth that success, and especially contemporary success, is not the test of merit. Our own observation in the world in which we move proves the same truth. Has not popular applause ascended like incense before tyrants who surrendered their lives to the basest and most degrading passions? Have not reproach, and persecution, and poverty, and defeat, been the companions of noble men in all ages, who have given their toil and blood to great causes? Are they less noble because they were the victims of arbitrary power, or because an untoward generation would not appreciate the grand problems which they solved, or because they lived in a generation which was not worthy of them?

If we now call the roll of the worthies who have given to the world its valued treasures of thought or faith, or who have subdued nature or developed art, it will be found that nearly all of them were in a life-long grapple with defeat and disaster. Some, and amongst them those whose names shine the brightest, would have welcomed neglect as a boon, but instead endured shame and martyrdom.

Other things being equal, the tribute of our admiration is more due to him who, in spite of disaster, pursues the cause which he has espoused, than to one who requires the stimulus of the applause of an admiring public. We are sure of a worthy object when we give our plaudits to the earnest soul who has followed his convictions in the midst of peril and disaster because of his faith in them.

It is well that even every honest effort in the cause of right and truth is not always crowned with success. Defeat is the discipline which trains the truly heroic soul to further and better endeavors. And if these last should fail, and he can do battle no more, he can lay down his armor with the assurance that others will put it on, and in God's good time vindicate the truth in whose behalf he had not vainly spent his life.

Our people, since the termination of the war, have illustrated the lessons learned in the school of adversity. Having vindicated their valor and endurance during the conflict, they have since exhibited their patience and self-control under the most trying circumstances. Their dignity in the midst of poverty and reverses, their heroic resignation to what they could not avert, have shown that subjugation itself could not conquer true greatness of soul. And by none have these virtues been illustrated more impressively than by the veterans of the long conflict, who laid down their arms at its close and mingled again with their fellow-citizens, distinguished from the rest only by their superior reverence for law, their patient industry, their avoidance of all that might cause needless irritation and provoke new humiliations, and their readiness to regard as friends in peace those whom they had so recently resisted as enemies in war.

The tree is known by its fruits. Your Excellency has reminded us that our civilization should be judged by the character of the men it has produced. If our recent revolution had been irradiated by the lustre of but the two names—Lee and Jackson—it would still have illumined one of the brightest pages in history.

I have not spoken of the former to-day; not because my heart was not full of him, but because the occasion required me to speak of another, and because the day is not distant when one more competent to do justice to this great theme than I have been to mine will address another assembly of the men of the South, and North, and West, upon these Capitol grounds, when our new Pantheon will be completed by the erection of another monument, and the inauguration of the statue of Lee, with his generals around him, amid the tears and gratulation of a countless multitude.

It was with matchless magnanimity that these two great chieftains delighted each to contribute to the glory of the other. Let us not dishonor ourselves by robbing either of one leaf in the chaplet which adorns their brows; but, catching the inspiration of their lofty example, let us thank God that He gave us two such names to shine as binary stars in the firmament above us.

It was in the noontide of Jackson's glory that he fell; but what a pall of darkness suddenly shrouded all the land in that hour! If any illustration were needed of the hold he had acquired on the hearts of our people, on the hearts of the good and brave and true throughout all the civilized world, it would be found in the universal lament which went up everywhere when it was announced that Jackson was dead—from the little girl at the Chandler House, who "wished that God would let her die in his stead, because then only her mother would cry; but if Jackson died, all the people of the country would cry"—from this humble child up to the commander-in-chief, who wept as only the strong and brave can weep at the tidings of his fall; from the weather-beaten sea-captain, who had never seen his face, but who burst into loud, uncontrollable grief, standing on the deck of his vessel, with his rugged sailors around him wondering what had happened to break that heart of oak, up to the English earl, honored on both sides of the Atlantic, who exclaimed, when the sad news came to him, "Jackson was in some respects the greatest man America ever produced."

The impressive ceremonies of the hour will bring back to some here present the memories of that day of sorrow, when, at the firing of a gun at the base of yonder monument, a procession began to move to the solemn strains of the Dead March in Saul—the hearse on which the dead hero lay preceded by a portion of the command of General Pickett, whose funeral obsequies you have just celebrated, and followed by a mighty throng of weeping citizens, until, having made a detour of the city, it paused at the door of the Capitol, when the body was borne within by reverent hands and laid on an altar erected beneath the dome.

The Congress of the Confederate States had adopted a device for their flag, and one emblazoned with it had just been completed, which was intended to be unfurled from the roof of the Capitol. It never fluttered from the height it was intended to grace. It became Jackson's winding-sheet. Oh! mournful prophecy of the fate of the Confederacy itself!

The military authorities shrouded him in the white, red, and blue flag of the Confederacy. The citizens decked his bier with the white, red, and blue flowers of spring until they rose high above it a soft floral pyramid; but the people everywhere embalmed him in their hearts with a love sweeter than all the fragrance of spring, and immortal as the verdure of the trees under which he now rests by the river of life.

And where, in all the annals of the world's sorrow for departed worth, was there such a pathetic impersonation of a nation's grief as was embodied in the old mutilated veteran of Jackson's division, who, as the shades of evening fell, and when the hour for the closing of the doors of the Capitol came, and when the lingering throng was warned to retire, was seen anxiously pressing through the crowd to take his last look at the face of his beloved leader. "They told him he was too late; that they were closing up the coffin for the last time; that the order had been given to clear the hall. He still struggled forward, refusing to take a denial, until one of the marshals of the day was about to exercise his authority to force him back; upon this the old soldier lifted the stump of his right arm toward the heavens, and with tears running down his bearded face, exclaimed, 'By this arm, which I lost for my country, I demand the privilege of seeing my general once more!' Such an appeal was irresistible, and, at the instance of the governor of the commonwealth, the pomp was arrested until this humble comrade had also dropped his tear upon the face of his dead leader."

Your Excellency did well to make the path broad which leads through these Capitol grounds to this statue, for it will be trodden by the feet of all who visit this city, whether they come from the banks of the Hudson, the Mississippi, or the Sacramento; whether from the Tiber, the Rhine, or the Danube.

Tender though they be, cold and sad are the closing lines of Collins in his ode to the memory of the brave whose rest is hallowed by their country's benedictions, depicting as they do, Honor coming as "a pilgrim gray," and Freedom as a "weeping hermit" repairing to the graves of departed heroes.

Not so will Honor come to this shrine; not as a worn and weary pilgrim, but as a generous youth with burnished shield and stainless sword, and heart beating high in sympathy for the right and true, to lay his mail-clad hand on this altar and swear eternal fealty to duty and to God.

Nor will Freedom for a time only repair to this hallowed spot; but here she will linger long and hopefully, not as a weeping hermit, but as a radiant divinity conscious of immortality.

It is true that memories unutterably sad have at times swept through this mighty throng to-day, but we are not here to indulge in reminiscences only, much less in vain regrets. We have a future to face, and in that future lies not only duty, and trials perhaps, but also hope.

For when we ask what has become of the principles in the defence of which Jackson imperiled and lost his life, then I answer: A form of government may change, a policy may perish, but a principle can never die. Circumstances may so change as to make the application of the principle no longer possible, but its innate vitality is not affected thereby. The conditions of society may be so altered as to make it idle to contend for a principle which no longer has any practical force, but these changed conditions of society have not annihilated one original truth.

The application of these postulates to the present situation of our country is obvious. The people of the South maintained, as their fathers maintained before them, that certain principles were essential to the perpetuation of the Union according to the original Constitution. Rather than surrender their convictions they took up arms to defend them. The appeal was vain. Defeat came, and they accepted it, with its consequences, just as they would have accepted victory, with its fruits. They have sworn to maintain the government as it is now constituted. They will not attempt again to assert their views of state sovereignty by an appeal to the sword. None feel this obligation to be more binding than the soldiers of the late Confederate armies. A soldier's parole is a sacred thing, and the men who are willing to die for a principle in time of war are the men of all others most likely to maintain their personal honor in time of peace.

But it is idle to shut our eyes to the fact that this consolidated empire of states is not the Union established by our fathers. No intelligent European student of American institutions is deceived by any such assumption. We gain nothing by deceiving ourselves.

And if history teaches any lesson, it is this, that a nation cannot long survive when the fundamental principles which gave it life originally are subverted. It is true republics have often degenerated into despotism. It is also true that after such transformation they have for a time been characterized by a force, a prosperity, and a glory never known in their earlier annals; but it has always been a force which absorbed and obliterated the rights of the citizen, a prosperity which was gained by the sacrifice of individual independence, a glory which was ever the precursor of inevitable anarchy, disintegration, and ultimate extinction.

If then it be asked how are we to escape the catastrophe, I answer, by a voluntary return to the fundamental principles upon which our republic was originally founded. And if it be objected that we have already entered upon one of those political revolutions which never go backward, then I ask, who gave to any one the authority to say so? or whence comes the infallibility which entitles any one to pronounce a judgment so overwhelming? Why may there not be a comprehension of what is truly politic, and what is grandly right, slumbering in the hearts of our American people—a people at once so practical and emotional, so capable of great enterprise and great magnanimity—a patriotism which is yet to awake and announce itself in a repudiation of all unconstitutional invasion of the liberties of the citizens of any portion of this broad Union? When we remember the awful strain to which the principles of other constitutional governments have been subjected in the excitement of revolutionary epochs, and how, when seemingly submerged by the tempest, they have risen again and reasserted themselves in their original integrity, why should we despair of seeing the ark of our liberties again resting on the summit of the mount, and hallowed by the benediction of Him who said, "Behold, I do set My bow in the cloud!"

And now standing before this statue, and, as in the living presence of the man it represents, cordially endorsing, as I do, the principles of the political school in which he was trained and in defence of which he died, and unable yet even to think of our dead Confederacy without memories unutterably tender, I speak not for myself, but for the South, when I say it is our interest, our duty and determination, to maintain the Union, and to make every possible contribution to its prosperity and glory, if all the states which compose it will unite in making it such a Union as our fathers framed, and in enthroning above it, not a Cæsar, but the Constitution in its old supremacy.

If ever these states are welded together in one great fraternal, enduring Union, with one heart pulsating through the entire frame as the tides throb through the bosom of the sea, it will be when they all stand on the same level, with such a jealous regard for each other's rights that when the interests or honor of one is assailed, all the rest, feeling the wound, even as the body feels the pain inflicted on one of its members, will kindle with just resentment at the outrage, because an injury done to a part is not only a wrong, but an indignity offered to the whole. But if that cannot be, then I trust the day will never dawn when the Southern people will add degradation to defeat, and hypocrisy to subjugation, by professing a love for the Union which denies to one of their states a single right accorded to Massachusetts or New York—to such a Union we will never be heartily loyal while that bronze hand grasps its sword—while yonder river chants the requiem of the sixteen thousand Confederate dead who, with Stuart among them, sleep on the hills of Hollywood.

But I will not end my oration with an anticipation so disheartening. I cannot so end it because I look forward to the future with more of hope than of despondency. I believe in the perpetuity of republican institutions, so far as any work of man may be said to possess that attribute. The complete emancipation of our constitutional liberty must come from other quarters, but we have our part to perform, one requiring patience, prudence, fortitude, faith.

A cloud of witnesses encompass us. The bronze figures on these monuments seem for the moment to be replaced by the spirits of the immortal men whose names they bear.

As if an angel spoke, their tones thrill our hearts.

First, it is the calm voice of Washington that we hear: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens."

Then Henry's clarion notes arouse us: "Liberty, the greatest of all earthly blessings: give us that precious jewel, and you may take all the rest!"

Then Jefferson speaks: "Fellow-citizens, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principles of government. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatsoever state or persuasion, religious or political. The support of state governments in all their rights, as the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad; the supremacy of the civil over military authority; the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith. And should we wander from these principles in moments of error and alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty and safety."

And last it is Jackson's clear, ringing tone to which we listen: "What is life without honor? Degradation is worse than death. We must think of the living and of those who are to come after us, and see that by God's blessing we transmit to them the freedom we have enjoyed."

Heaven, hear the prayer of our dead, immortal hero!

GEORGE FREDERICK HOLMES

[1820-1897]

HENRY E. SHEPHERD

THE subject of our sketch, George Frederick Holmes, was born at Straebrock, Demerara, British Guiana, August 2, 1820. Young Holmes sprang from that sturdy and vigorous Northumbrian race which has in all time borne up the banner of England, and glorified her name in the world of material development, as well as intellectual and spiritual achievement. His mother was Mary Ann Pemberton, daughter of Dr. Stephen Pemberton; his father was Joseph Henry Hendon Holmes, F.S.A., Advocate of the Bar of Demerara, Proctor of Vice Admiralty and Judge Advocate to the forces of Demerara and Essequibo. The boy was the eldest son of his parents and when an infant, two years of age, he accompanied them on a visit to the home of his maternal grandfather, Dr. Stephen Pemberton, and his maiden daughter Miss Elizabeth Pemberton. Upon her return to her South American home, his mother entrusted the child to the care of his grandfather and his aunt. He was placed in one of the foremost schools at Sunderland, in the historic country palatine of Durham, and from the first displayed that insatiable love of knowledge in all her complex forms, and that power of appropriating and assimilating her treasures which was perhaps the most strongly marked characteristic of his strange, eventful history.

At the dawning age of six, he was reading Latin and Greek. His record recalls such infantile prodigies as Coleridge, John Stuart Mill and Jeremy Taylor. Among his youthful contemporaries were many who in later days won fame in literature, at the bar, in the church, in arms, and in the drama. Tom Taylor, the playwright, of whom he always spoke with genuine affection, was his early comate, and his correspondent during the long years of his residence in America.

His school life at Sunderland, brilliant as it was, was the prelude to his career at the University, where he won in December, 1836, the prize scholarship. His university education did not extend beyond a single session. An act, inspired by a sense of grateful appreciation toward the aunt whose heir he was understood to be, and which the most uncharitable judgment can regard as nothing more than an indiscretion prompted by gratitude, was the critical point in the life of young Holmes, and completely changed the course of his subsequent history. As a means of giving him an object lesson in worldly wisdom and inculcating prudent, cautious self-control as its root, the lad of seventeen, in the flush of his brilliant university career, was dispatched upon a sailing vessel to America and landed at Quebec July 28, 1837. At this point his direct relation to his motherland forever ceased. His father was dead, and his proud manly spirit would not endure the indignity, as he conceived it, to which he had been subjected by his aunt and mother. He was now cast upon his own resources, in a strange land, a mere youth, and it may be said, alienated from his blood and kindred, as a result of their hardness of heart and blindness of judgment. Yet he threw down the gauntlet to the world which environed him, with a knightly heroism that never quailed, even to that supreme November day in 1897 when he cried out "England!" as if some radiant vision of the "precious stone set in the silver sea," swam into his ken, all beauteous in its early form and like a finer light in light.

Young Holmes resorted to every expedient to earn an honorable livelihood in the land of his adoption. He sojourned in Canada for a year; we find him afterwards in Philadelphia; at a later day in South Carolina. For a brief period he had a chair in Richmond College, Virginia, then at the College of William and Mary; and in 1848 he was elected president of the newly founded University of Mississippi. Several years were devoted to the law, but the drudgery of the bar proved eminently uncongenial to one of his surpassing literary and intellectual spirit. In the magnificent isolation of Southwestern Virginia, then the very frontier of civilization, he conducted a classical school, in which the purest type of English culture was fostered with affectionate and assiduous zeal. All these, however, were preliminary or preluding stages leading up to his supreme work, for it is with the University of Virginia that his fame and memory will be forever linked. On the fourteenth of February, 1857, Mr. Holmes was elected to the chair of history and general literature, the appointment taking effect upon the first of July of this same year. In the new sphere upon which he had now entered he labored continuously until he passed to his rest, November 4, 1897. The range and scope of his chair was subjected to more than one form of contraction during the closing period of his university career, as the studies of history and of English were elevated to the rank of special departments, each having its own head. Still, his enthusiasm did not abate nor his zeal relax, with the burden of years nor the coming of the ineluctable end. The writer was a member of Mr. Holmes's class in history and literature during the memorable session of 1860-61. Since that troublous time, when we stood upon the verge of grim-visaged war, he has listened to the foremost lights in the great centers of European learning—some of whom were conceded an absolute primacy in the special sphere of literature or history with which their renown is forever associated. Yet among these living oracles of the elder world of culture, there was none that in variety, range and versatility of attainment could bear away the palm from our modest and unheralded professor of history and literature, in the University of Virginia. As a lecturer and teacher Mr. Holmes was not marked by rigid adherence to system or exactness of method. He gave his fancy free rein, and indulged in excursions and digressions which seemed to take all history and literature as their province. His knowledge was of the rarest and most esoteric type. The student heard from him the hidden things of learning such as were revealed by no other expounder of historic lore. There was not a trace of the conventional professorial method—the personality of the man dominated all. While his comprehensive and catholic intellect had assimilated every phase of historic and literary development, he was devoted to certain eras and characters, as well as to certain theories, with a constancy that rose to the height of personal attachment and affection. Such, for example, was his attitude toward the prevailing influence of the Roman Empire upon the civilizations of the modern world; the relation of Roger Bacon to his namesake, the famed Chancellor and champion of the Inductive Philosophy; the philosophical systems of Auguste Comte, Leibnitz, and Sir William Hamilton: the Shakespeare-Baconian theory and the then comparatively unheralded poetry of Alfred Tennyson. History was his forte, but his foible was omniscience. His acquaintance with the physical sciences from the view-point of their evolution or development was singularly comprehensive and exact: his inaugural address as president of the University of Mississippi, 1848, is an impressive commentary upon this broad and seemingly unguarded statement. In the range and versatility of his intellect and his attainments, Mr. Holmes may fairly challenge comparison with any scholar that America has thus far given to the world. A striking parallel presents itself in the life and work of Mark Pattison, the famous rector of Lincoln College, Oxford-and Pattison, like Holmes, was a native of the North of England.

The myth of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table possessed a peculiar fascination for an intellect so finely tempered as that of Mr. Holmes. His lectures upon this subject, delivered at the Peabody Institute, Baltimore, November, 1873, have never been surpassed in this sphere of literary exegesis. To his richly dowered intellect, the story of the blameless king was the golden cord that bound into harmony the two extremes of our incomparable literature.

No feature of Mr. Holmes's intellectual life is more rich and inspiring to the student of literature than his private correspondence. If edited judiciously and with discrimination it would prove one of the rarest of treasures. Many of the foremost lights of the intellectual world are here—letters from Auguste Comte, Sir William Hamilton, his schoolmate Tom Taylor, Rev. Dr. Richard Fuller, Rev. Dr. James H. Thornwell, Rev. Dr. B. M. Palmer, William Gilmore Simms, William C. Preston, Hugh S. Legaré, Albert Taylor Bledsoe, Francis Lieber, one of the last of the monarchs of universal learning. The collection is almost unique in our immature and assertive occidental civilization.

The domestic life of Mr. Holmes was marked by a peculiar sweetness and light. In his early years he married a daughter of Honorable John Floyd, at one time Governor of Virginia, whose name was a wand to conjure with during the critical period that heralded the coming of our national conflict. This graceful and gentle lady presided over his home with the ideal charm that marked the Virginia matron of the golden age. A bounteous hospitality was invested with an enchanting radiance by the ceaseless feast of reason blending with the flow of soul. The poet's vision was realized to the life:

"Heart affluence in discursive talk,
From household fountains, never dry,
The critic clearness of an eye
That saw through all the muses' walk."

The several text-books prepared under Mr. Holmes's auspices and designed for the use of schools, with all their characteristic merits, convey no adequate impression of his vast and varied learning. Mechanical or empirical labor was uncongenial and alien to his nature. Those who would form a just appreciation of his far-reaching attainments, intensive and extensive as they were, must give their days and nights to his essays, monographs, and perhaps above all, to his private correspondence. His article on the "Formation of Elizabethan English," in Bledsoe's Southern Review. October, 1872, will serve as an admirable illustration, though it is but one of many equally laden with rare and original research that might be readily cited. More than one result of later investigation in the sphere of literature and history that has been proclaimed to the world with all the charm of novelty was announced to his classes by Mr. Holmes in the course of his ordinary instruction without pomp or ostentation, but with the tranquil dignity that is the unfailing characteristic of those who "follow knowledge like a sinking star beyond the utmost bound of human thought." In 1801 the University of Durham honored herself by conferring the degree of D.C.L. upon the lad of seventeen who had been driven from her doors more than half a century before by the folly of his natural guardians, and whose renown had now girdled the globe. No mark of recognition ever gave him more genuine and heartfelt pleasure, nor in all the annals of scholarship has such a distinction been more worthily bestowed. The end came November 4, 1897, when he had attained the ripe age of seventy-seven. He was most faithfully and lovingly cared for by his youngest daughter, upon whom the mantle of her mother had fallen, as Mrs. Holmes passed to her rest about ten years before her husband. The last days were marked by the same self-repression, delicate regard for the happiness of others, and all-pervading modesty that sat like a grace upon his vigorous life. His aversion to the spectacular in every form followed him to the grave, as is illustrated in the rigid injunction prohibiting all but the simplest funeral rites, the noble and impressive burial service of the Episcopal Church being provided for, to the exclusion of sermon, comment, crape, flowers or even the conventional resolutions of respect on the part of his colleagues, the faculty of the University. "So passed his strong, heroic soul away." It may be affirmed, without a suspicion of overwrought or undiscerning eulogy, that in comprehensive culture, as well as subtilizing intellect, he stands without peer or rival amid all the champions of wisdom and light whom the motherland has contributed to our new English Nation on this side the silver sea.

Henry E. Shepherd.

WHO WROTE SHAKESPEARE?

De Bow's Review, February, 1868.

- . . . The three questions to be discriminated and to be separately decided are these:
- 1.—Did Shakespeare write the plays and poems which are ascribed to him?
- 2.—Could they have been written by Sir Walter Raleigh and his friends?
 - 3.—Could they have been written by Lord Bacon?

The three questions are blended together and discussed together by Miss Delia Bacon, and the confusion thence resulting is used by her both as an argument that Shakespeare did not write the works which have been ascribed to him during two centuries and a half, and that Bacon did, with the assistance, direct or indirect, of Raleigh and Raleigh's confraternity of wits.

The first and third questions are similarly conjoined by Judge Holmes, and with something of the same result.

It must be remarked that both the lady and the gentleman manifest singular adroitness in transforming hypotheses into conclusions, in jumping from hypothetical admissions of their own to supposed demonstrations, and in linking together mere conjectures in order to form a chain of evidence.

From this procedure results a continuous succession of sophisms and inconsequences, each perhaps separately trivial, which brings them by their repetition of the hop-skip-and-jump procedure to their predetermined goal.

In order to avoid the appearance of being guilty of any such fallacies as we have charged to those who impugn the validity of Shakespeare's claim to Shakespeare's works, it is proper to observe that both Miss Delia Bacon and Judge Holmes admit that these productions were habitually ascribed to Shakespeare in his lifetime, and were never ascribed to Raleigh, or Bacon, or anyone else; and that the same belief has subsisted without challenge from the end of the Sixteenth Century down to the time of the composition of these volumes of preposterous revelation. It is therefore unnecessary, as it would be invalid, to show by way of refutation that the entries in the stage books and in the records of the censorship, the belief of fellow-actors, brother dramatists, friends, and contemporaries of all sorts, the title pages of the first editions of his plays, and the testimony of Heming and Condell, the editors of the first collection of the Shakespearian Drama, all bear undivided evidence to the authorship of William Shakespeare. A great difficulty is thus removed out of the way of the assailants; for, if this evidence could be employed, it is absolutely irresistible. Considering the dense mist which surrounds every period of the private and personal career of Shakespeare—the absence of any detailed or credible chronology of his plays, it is amazing that so many testimonies should have been preserved to the authorship of the several plays.

From Greene's 'Groat's Worth of Wit' and Meres's 'Treasury of Wit,' to the encomiastic verse of Ben Jonson prefixed to the first edition of the collected dramas of Shakespeare, seven years after Shakespeare's death; and to the slight but deliberate notices in Ben Jonson's 'Underwoods,' there is a continuous series of attestations—all of which, however, must be thrown out and left unemployed.

It is perfectly legitimate, however, to observe that it is wholly inexplicable, if Shakespeare did not write the works ascribed to him, that nowhere should any suspicion of the public error or any intimation of the borrowed plumes be furnished in the copious array of notices extending over a period of forty years during the lives of his associates. It is unintelligible that Ben Jonson, a fellow actor, a rival dramatist, a compotator, a life-long, though perhaps querulous friend, attached in common to Shakespeare and Bacon, should never have indicated the least doubt on the subject, but should have written his eulogy of the deceased poet in terms utterly incompatible with any such suspicion, and should even have alluded to the appearance of the manuscripts of Shakespeare's plays, with which he was familiar, without any hesitation in regard to the authorship. It is equally unintelligible that Shakespeare should have received the complimentary regards of Queen Elizabeth and King James for works written by someone else. and for merits to which he was conscious of having no claim. There must have been something in his appearance, manner, bearing, sentiments, conversation, which comported with his public reputation as poet and playwright, or the borrowed feathers would have dropped off, like the wings of Icarus, in the sunshine of Court favor.

These, however, are only adverse doubts which justify an unfavorable presumption in regard to any theory which seeks to divest Shakespeare of his laurel crown and singing robes. They cannot be pressed as a refutation, when the investigation commences with the admission that Shakespeare was and is the reputed author of the works whose composition is now sought to be referred to other hands.

This admission precludes the use of all testimony otherwise available, and compels the postponement of the decision of the principal question until the others have been determined. There is only one argument which can be consistently introduced at this stage of the inquiry. It is this: Those who impugn Shakespeare's authorship assert, though they adduce no evidence for the assertion, which is the foundation of the case. that the concealment of the true author or authors was a deliberate scheme, and that Shakespeare was put forward as the ostensible author in order to screen the true authors from public recognition. We may ask whether there is any instance in the whole course of literary history of such a secret being so long and so faithfully kept, extending as it must have done to such a multitude of particular instances of concealment. The "Letters of Junius" are the only example that could be adduced; but there is no analogy between the two cases. The secret of the authorship of the "Letters of Junius" was such that it could be preserved by the writer. It was probably confined to him. It may have been known to King George III, it may possibly have been revealed to a few others; it may have been vaguely suspected by many. But it was hid by the secret of the author alone, and he had ample reason for the utmost caution and reticence. But the authorship of the letters was shrewdly suspected at the time of their appearance; it has been suspected ever since. Opinions may differ, and may settle on very different names; but no one supposes that Junius was one person, and the author of "Junius" another. Stat nominis umbra—the name remains, the man who is shaded by the name may be undiscovered. There was no avowed and admitted claim of authorship during the period of publication, to be received without scruple for two centuries and a half and then suddenly questioned. Shakespeare is a real historical personage, moving about actively in his day, having a large circle of acquaintances in all ranks, and honored from the throne to the green-room and the pit for the brilliant succession of comedies and tragedies brought forward as the fruits of his amazing genius. If he were not the author, it is inconceivable that the secret should have been so successfully kept as never to have been suspected by any of the thousands who had been delighted by his productions; that no intimation should ever have been given by any incongruity between the character, conduct, and talents of Shakespeare, and the unrivaled credit which he enjoyed for his reputed works.

The supposed participation of Scipio Africanus and Loelius in the creation of the comedies of Terence furnishes no parallelism to this incredible partnership. There is not a particle of valid evidence that the plays of the African dramatist were composed directly or indirectly by any of the brilliant coterie which gathered around Scipio. But, waiving this point, the suspicion was entertained and the accusation alleged at the time of the exhibition of these dramas. The charge is alluded to by Terence himself in terms which show both his willingness to derive the benefit which may be expected from this putative paternity, and the want of any foundation for the fancy. To make the case parallel, it would be necessary that Terence should have been acknowledged as unquestionably the author during his lifetime and for two hundred and fifty years thereafter; and that some bold innovator in the reign of Claudius or Nero should have first denied his title and attributed these works to Scipio and his companions.

The project of discarding Shakespeare's claims could only arise on the presumption that our knowledge of the Elizabethan age was fragmentary, imperfect, and inadequate, and that, therefore, there was much room for ingenious conjecture to supply defective information. But exactly the reverse is the case. From the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the restoration of Charles II our sources of information are singularly numerous, and our knowledge is so minute and so free from suspicion, after the different authorities have been carefully collated, that there is less excuse or opportunity for conjecture than in almost any earlier or later period of English history. There may be ample room for diversity of interpretation; there can scarcely be any for dispute in regard to important facts. Both Miss Bacon and Judge Holmes write in seeming unconsciousness of this surprising exuberance of information, though Judge Holmes has made himself fully acquainted with the extensive recent literature respecting both Shakespeare and Lord Bacon.

There is one preliminary delusion which has evidently suggested the doubt of the accredited authorship of the works of Shakespeare, and given to the arguments on the subject what little plausibility it may possess. This delusion grows out of the assumption that Shakespeare was an unlearned and uneducated man, though the plays bear continual evidence of varied information, extensive reading, and considerable scholarship, as well as minute and acute observation. The natural conclusion from this flagrant incongruity would be that Shakespeare was not so devoid of culture as he had been represented to be. The hasty inference drawn by Miss Delia Bacon and Judge Holmes is, that an unlettered man could not have composed these works, and that, as Shakespeare was unlettered, he could not have written them. The conclusion rests upon a purely arbitrary assumption—an assumption wholly unwarranted in the presence of the evidence afforded by the works themselves. The acceptance of the hypothesis of Shakespeare's want of education necessitated the discovery of some contemporary possessed of the requisite learning as well as genius for their composition, in utter forgetfulness of the fact that the world has not produced more than one Shakespeare, and that none but himself can be his parallel. We are not going to argue the question of Shakespeare's acquirements here, but we may venture to say that his scholastic learning was but little inferior to Raleigh's, and not very far below Bacon's. The prevalent misapprehension, which has so beguiled the literary public, and so egregiously misled both Miss Bacon and Judge Holmes, rests upon the misconception of Ben Jonson's language in the eulogy already alluded to. "Rare Ben" says:

Though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek From thence to honour thee.

The obvious signification of this is that Shakespeare's scholarship was not such as to entitle him to commendation on account of any extraordinary erudition. It admits an acquaintance, though not extensive, with Latin literature, and some knowledge, probably only a smattering, of Greek. But the full import of this expression cannot be apprehended until it is remembered that Ben Jonson was himself one of the finest scholars and most learned men of his age—the favorite pupil of Camden—the friend and companion of Bacon, and afterwards of Hobbes-the associate of the profound classical and antiquarian researches of John Selden. What would be very "small Latin and less Greek" in the estimation of Ben Jonson. would be copious erudition for any ordinary student. Hinc origo malorum—hence has proceeded the continual misconceptions of Shakespeare's attainments. From this first erroneous assumption have proceeded the wild hypotheses of the writers whom we are noticing. Admit that Shakespeare possessed the moderate share of classical and other academical learning evinced by his plays, and there is no necessity and no excuse for looking elsewhere for their author. The first postulate, therefore, of the Boston Maiden and the Missouri Judge fails utterly. But the refutation of these preliminary assumptions is as far as we can logically proceed, until we have disposed of the special conjectures by which it is proposed to explain the production of the unequaled works which have given eternal glory to Shakespeare's name.

2.—Could Shakespeare's plays have been written by Raleigh and his friends?

Miss Delia Bacon does not directly maintain this thesis, but she squints terribly in that direction—and she argues the proposition most ingeniously and elaborately. It is impossible to declare what is her precise thesis. She coquettes with different alternatives. With a ladylike indisposition to commit herself to an insecure proposition, she favors rival claimants and distributes her favors to the contending parties. The general tenor of her book inclines towards the claim of Bacon—its commencement points decidedly towards Raleigh. Sir Walter seems to be her first choice—Lord Bacon the option of her matured judgment. But with the enduring tenderness of her sex, she never forgets or wholly renounces her early attachments.

Sir Walter Raleigh was certainly the most remarkable man among the handsome and aspiring youths whom the Maiden Oueen attracted from all parts of England to her Court and riveted there. A singular class of men they constituted those Sidneys, Ratcliffes, Veres, Blounts, Norrises, Cavendishes, Grenvilles, Drakes, Smiths, Gilberts, Champernons, etc. -active, elegant, brilliant, witty, daring, accomplished, unscrupulous; at once men of letters and arms; poets and soldiers; courtiers and statesmen; pirates and founders of states; speculators and judges; uniting the largest and deepest reflection with the most reckless adventure; one day scheming for a fair lady's smiles or a matrimonial fortune, next day starting out after Spanish galleons, the settlement of colonies, or the exploration of unknown lands; penetrating into Muscovy, Turkey, Persia, India, Africa, the shore of North America or the valleys of the Orinoco and the Amazon; traversing the Atlantic, Arctic, Indian and Pacific oceans with the same fearless spirit with which they assailed Catherine De Médicis and the armies of the League, or hurled back the invincible Armada, or pushed their fortunes at Court, or jostled rivals out of their way. In this splendid company Raleigh was the most splendid, and with the solitary exception of Sir Philip Sidney, the most accomplished figure. But Raleigh surpassed Sir Philip as much in breadth and depth of comprehension as Sir Philip surpassed him in serene, grave and stately grandeur. Raleigh was as restless as the butterfly; he was ever on the wing. At one time he is in France fighting under the banners of the gallant Henry of Navarre; at another he is on the banks of the Orinoco. Now he is reclining with Spenser on the grassy slopes of the Mulla; and now he is fighting Spanish galleys off the Azores. At one time he is entrancing the fair Elizabeth Throckmorton and entranced by her; at another he is scraping together all his means to found a state of his own in Virginia, or to supply and recruit the colonists whose disappearance was still unknown to him, and whose extinction he was unwilling to anticipate. With him there was no leisure for the composition of the long series of the Shakespearian dramas, or for any participation in their composition. In fact, at the time when Shakespeare's early reputation was made by the surprising rapidity and beauty of his plays-chiefly comedies-Raleigh was involved in all the difficulties, distractions, anxieties and cares of the first Virginia colony-or in the preparation and service against the Spanish fleets and harbors. When Shakespeare was placing the crown of glory on his career by the production of his latest and greatest plays, Raleigh was in the Tower writing the 'History of the World,' with the aid of Ben Ionson, the Earl of Northumberland, and other friends or State prisoners. This was a task by no means of light labor, light exaction, light research, or light meditation. Surely there was no leisure here for the composition of dramas—still less for the composition of such dramas as Shakespeare's—nor could his bosom's lord sit so lightly on his throne during those years of anxious apprehension as to have poured out that tranquil and contented radiance of a mind at ease and satisfied with the world, though measuring it justly, which is so characteristic of all the mature works of Shakespeare. The number and array of the Shakespearian dramas are as surprising as any other phenomena connected with those wondrous inventions. There is nothing in literature comparable to such a rapid and brilliant career of successful industry, in the midst of many avocations, but the poems and novels and miscellaneous writings of Sir Walter Scott. If mere numbers be regarded, greater productiveness was exhibited by Sophocles and other Attic dramatists, by Lope De Vega and Calderon di Barca: but how dissimilar was the texture, how much narrower the compass of their inventions! Is it conceivable that the long list of Shakespeare's plays should have been produced in the midst of the Court services and Court intrigues of Raleighof his business avocation and speculations, sometimes in Devonshire, sometimes in Ireland, sometimes looking after sweet wines or other monopolies—in the discharge of his duties as Captain of the Royal Guard-during his expeditions by land or sea, in war or in exploration, in regular military employment, or chasing Spanish prizes; or should have been composed in his long captivity, simultaneously with the compilation of his 'History of the World'? That there was a literary confederation in the production of his 'History of the World', we know. His friends and his fellow-prisoners gathered up the materials, hunted up authorities, discussed dubious points, and perhaps lent other aid, while Raleigh furnished the brain of a statesman and of a man of the world, the genius of the historian, and the style of the founder of nations. But it is a terrible anachronism to extend this kind of literary confederation back to his earlier life, notwithstanding what was done at the Mermaid, and to suppose that the plays of Shakespeare could have been moulded by any such joint stock company of literary talent.

There is an important conclusion, however, which may be drawn from the intimate cooperation of diverse capacities in the production of the 'History of the World', and from the numerous literary partnerships, such as that of Beaumont and Fletcher, which were engaged in supplying the demands of the theatres. This conclusion is that there was a much freer association of intellects, a much more liberal and encompassing atmosphere of learning and talent in the Elizabethan age than in any subsequent period. We may hence safely infer that Shakespeare had abundant opportunities of supplying any deficiencies in his own learning by frequent, easy, genial, appreciative intercourse with more learned friends, with experienced acquaintances, with men who had commanded armies and assisted in the guidance of states. Whatever knowledge, learning, observation could communicate, was readily accessible, and circulated freely as the air, conveying not merely broken and disconnected fragments of information, but breathing around a vital influence which was imbibed by all within its sphere, and which furnished the common inspiration of all. To this ethereal and sparkling atmosphere Raleigh contributed his abundant thought, his varied and novel experience, his ample imagination, as Bacon contributed his large sagacity. his profound meditation, his practical wisdom, and as Shakespeare contributed his lofty poesy, his dazzing wit, his vast comprehension, his versatile fancy, and his boundless sympathy with all the members of the human family, and with all the creations of the Almighty.

That Raleigh was a poet will be denied by none who remember his beautiful reply to the exquisite verses of Marlowe. That Raleigh was a genius of rare intellectual compass and remarkable literary taste will be disputed by none who remember the pregnant and sonorous passages of his 'History of the World.' But there is nothing in either the prose or the poetry of Raleigh which indicated that, even with the fullest leisure and the most entire devotion of his time and talents to dramatic composition, he could have written a single scene of any one of the tragedies or comedies of Shakespeare. Raleigh speculated on the weaknesses of others; he did not refer them to the general laws of human life, and to the shifting currents of circumstances, all amenable to the higher Providence and working out the purposes of destiny. He did not portray the virtues and vices of men for the sake of contemplating the varied pictures, or of moving the sympathetic emotions of beholders. His arts were the arts of a diplomatist, an intriguant, and a ruler of men, not of a large-visioned student of nature, ever justifying the ways of God to man, and awakening a tender compassion for the faults and the follies of humanity. In these respects he was as diverse from the whole habit of thought of Bacon or Shakespeare as it was possible to be. Granting, what should by no means be granted, that Raleigh could have written "Richard III," it was impossible for him to have written "Hamlet," "King Lear," or "The Tempest."

Raleigh is, however, only one of the personages in Miss Delia Bacon's scheme. He is merely the magnus Apollo of the secret society of reference; and though she commences her inconclusive work with the apparent disposition to concede to him the main part of the production, or suggestion and inspiration of the Shakespearian drama, she occupies the greater part of her volume, and brings it to a conclusion, with an equally manifest desire to refer the actual composition of Shakespeare's poems exclusively, or almost exclusively, to Lord Bacon. She is indistinct and unsettled on every point but two—that Shakespeare did not write Shakespeare—and that there was an elaborate system of secret organization and concealment in everything connected with the works of both Shakespeare and Bacon. This brings us to the consideration of the third question.

3.—Could the dramas of Shakespeare have been written by Lord Bacon?

That Shakespeare was merely a stalking-horse for Bacon—

"beneath the roof is Jove"—is the position for which Judge Holmes energetically contends. It is also the inference implied in most of the argumentations and elucidations of Miss Bacon. We have notable facilities for the determination of this question. As already stated, the chronology of Lord Bacon's life and occupations is almost perfect. If similarly minute and authentic information existed in regard to the daily acts of William Shakespeare, a confident and irrecusable decision might be reached at once. But even without the opportunity of making any such rigid collation of the avocations of these two illustrious men, there is sufficient material to demonstrate the absolute impossibility that the plays of Shakespeare could have been written by Lord Bacon.

If Raleigh's life was occupied by so many multifarious and distracting cares as to leave no time for the composition of the cycle of the Shakespearian dramas, this is still more strikingly the case with Bacon's. The wanderings of the latter were much more infrequent and more restricted than those of the former. There is no reason to believe that Bacon was ever out of England, except in his boyhood, when he accompanied Sir Amyas Paulet on his embassy to France. His ordinary tour extended no further than to Twickenham or Gorhambury. His longest journey after his return from the Continent was when he went to meet James I on his progress from Scotland at his accession to the English throne. The domesticity of Bacon was due to no disinclination to travel, but to his incessant labors in the study and practice of his profession, in his political employments, in his speculative pursuits and experiments, and in his industrial enterprises. Knowing that Bacon made himself the rival of Coke as a jurist, that he frequently exhibited more accurate and recondite knowledge of law than that great expositor of the common law of England. that almost from the time of his admission to the bar he was employed in the legal and other business of the Crown, that many years of his life were devoted to the political and legal interests of Essex, that he was Solicitor, Attorney-general, Lord Keeper and Chancellor, it is difficult to understand how he could have secured the leisure for those meditations, investigations and literary or philosophical exercises which are transmitted to us incompletely in the sixteen octavo volumes of Montagu's edition of his works. Add to these dissimilar but engrossing exactions the invention and creation of the whole body of the Shakespearian Remains, and the difficulty is changed to an impossibility.

If we had time or space, we have no doubt that the latter absurdity of the concealed authorship alleged might be demonstrated from the chronological contradictions involved in the hypothesis. A rigid comparison of the dates of Shakespeare's separate plays, so far as they could be approximately ascertained, with Bacon's contemporaneous employments, would show that they could not by any possibility have been written by Bacon.

It has been more than once noted that Bacon appeared to have been wholly unacquainted with the writings of Shakespeare. There is not a single instance in all his works—in his philosophical treatises, in his plays, in his lightest productions, in his histories, in his legal arguments, in his speeches in Parliament—of any quotation from Shakespeare, or of any reference to his illustrious contemporary. This is very noticeable in an author so fond of the ornament of citation as Bacon. He would not have been ignorant of the existence—he could not have been incognizant of the renown of Shakespeare. In his attendance at Court, he must often have been present at the representation of the plays

Which so did take Eliza and our James.

His witticisms on the subject of Hayward's 'History of Richard II' precludes the suspicion of ignorance of the play of the same name. The interpretation given by the Queen of Richard II in her interview with Lambard, the connection of the play with the culminating crime of Essex and with the trial for treason thence resulting, in which Bacon was engaged—all preclude the suspicion of such ignorance. His intimacy with Ben Jonson is equally adverse to this supposition. But he is equally chary of quoting from Spenser. He refers to him, perhaps on one occasion. He never borrows a grace or illustration from him. He shows equal disregard of all the other English poets. He would not mix their perishable products with the fabrics of his wondrous loom. He had no confidence in the durability of the English tongue. Thus may be explained his remarkable reticence in regard to Shakespeare, supposing Shakespeare to be more than an alter ego. But if he were himself hidden behind the mask of Shakespeare, there were probably stronger reasons for citing from the reputed works of Shakespeare than for refusing to do so—though it may be alleged that this abstinence was a trick of art to hide the connection between the philosopher and the poet.

But if this were so, it would be still more difficult to explain the absence of any marked parallelism in thought or expression between two such mighty intellects and voluminous authors as are represented by the names of Bacon and Shakespeare. There is not a single instance in which Shakespeare appears to have borrowed anything from Bacon, as there is none in which Bacon appears to have been indebted in the slightest degree to Shakespeare. There is not one indubitable example of positive agreement. It would have been impracticable for any man, writing under two distinct characters, to have deliberately separated the two personages which he presented with such uniformity as to have avoided in the long revolution of the double career any repetition of his thought, any recurrence of his expression. There is continual repetition in the Baconian works, there is frequent repetition in the works of Shakespeare; but there is no exchange of thought, sentiment, or phrase between Bacon and Shakespeare. There are a few passages in which there is a striking accordance of view between the Lord Chancellor and the stockholder of the Globe Theatre; but even when such consonance may be detected, there is more divergence than approximation of thought, and the common position appears rather as the republication of a current tenet than as a new and characteristic discovery, This is true with regard to the declaration of the functions of art, to the reflections upon the limits and nature of the knowledge of men, and in regard to the principle announced in the First Aphorism of the "Novum Organon." Unquestionably, Miss Delia Bacon and Judge Holmes have multiplied indefinitely the supposed parallelisms—but they are the discoveries of an overstrained, a diseased, and a fantastic perspicacity. We will not say that there is no consilience of sentiment in any of the passages adduced by them—we will only say that there is no identity. The argument is in the main imaginary; when not imaginary, it is latent, unconscious, implicit. The employment of the same common word in the same or in a different connection is considered sufficient indication of unity of authorship. If Shakespeare mentions a dog and Bacon mentions a dog also, it justifies with them the allegation that Bacon must have written Shakespeare. The notice of the more striking of such accordances may be of great service for the thorough estimation of both authors, and also for the due appreciation of the intellectual character of the age. They are due to the pressure of the contemporaneous atmosphere of thought, and reveal to us the form and body of the times. But that more can be properly discerned in them than this is a thesis not to be maintained.

A very searching but prosaic test may be applied to the determination of this question of single authorship. speare's preëminence above all other English authors is not more manifested by the marvelous superiority of his poetic genius than by the singular exuberance of his vocabulary. Marsh has estimated the number of distinct words employed by Shakespeare as 15,000. Milton uses only 8,000, notwithstanding the abundance, richness, and splendor of his style. Shakespeare invents no words; he scarcely ever introduces a philosophical or technical term. His phraseology is pure, unadulterated, unaffected English. He repudiates and ridicules the euphemisms current in his day. Now contrast the vocabulary of Shakespeare with that of Bacon. There are no means of ascertaining the number of words employed by Bacon; there is no concordance to his works, as there is to the works of Shakespeare and of Milton. But we may confidently assert that the vocabulary of Bacon is not more copious than that of Milton, notwithstanding his continual inventions, adaptations, neoterisms, and both technical and philosophical phrases. It would have been impossible for the vocabulary of the same man to have been of such unequal extent in two different classes of works. Moreover, the strange peculiarity would be exhibited, if the plays are ascribed to Bacon, that the simple and natural though more abundant utterance is employed in the poetical productions, while the more artificial, elaborate and pedantic expression is reserved for the promulgation of a new philosophy.

We possess another criterion, still more impressive if really less significant, for the determination of this question of Bacon's possible connection with the Shakespearian gallery of portraits. Bacon was a poet and dramatist. We possess specimens of his art. We have poems by him which have been unfairly ridiculed and condemned, though they are not to be brought into even momentary comparison with the slightest effusions of Shakespeare. His versions of some of the Psalms, which were written on a sick-bed, in old age, with disappointed hopes and breaking heart, are no just test of his poetical powers: but they suffice to show the absence of any touch of that supreme poetic genius which irradiates all Shakespeare's productions. Plays, masques, etc., Bacon wrote, or helped to write, for the community of Gray's Inn, and he seems to have won much reputation by the skill displayed on such occasions. He wrote them also for other entertainments. One of these dramatic relaxations we still possess, and there is a painful anecdote connected with it. On the reconciliation of the Queen with Essex after that young lord's first disgrace, a high festival was held at Essex House to celebrate the Queen's birthday and the restoration of the royal favor. Bacon wrote a dramatic piece for this celebration. He inserted in it a compliment to Raleigh for his gallant enterprise of exploring the course of the Orinoco and the interior of Guiana, in order to promote a return of amicable relations between Sir Walter and the Earl of Essex. This passage was struck out by the Earl's own hand.

This little dramatic dialogue is thoroughly Baconian: it is in no respect Shakespearian. We have the sounding eloquence of the Baconian strain: there is none of the soft, rich, penetrating, winning melody of Shakespeare's music. It is stiff, stately, and rustling prose; not easy, but exquisitely finished verse. It is full of the wisdom of a statesman, of the acute observations of a courtier who has seen much of the world; it has nothing of the heaven-given intuition, the comprehensive and sympathetic appreciation of the great poet, who was akin to all types of humanity, in harmony with all the works, ordinances and purposes of the Creator. The characters are all "masks and faces"; they exhibit neither heart nor life. There is no dramatic presentation; there is only a series of his own essays cut into formal declamation, delivered in rotation.

Aeternos Musæ meminisse volebant. Hos Corydon, illos referebat in ordine Thyrsis.

This is Bacon, but it is not Shakespeare; and it shows the dissimilarity which divides them—dispares, non impares. But the writer of this dialogue could no more have written the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" or "Macbeth" than the author of "Hamlet" could have written the "Novum Organon" or the "Sylva Sylvarum."

The style of Bacon is not merely distinctively his ownthe very form and vesture of his thought—but it is utterly unlike that of any other writer in the English or in any other tongue. There may be more grandeur in the full organ tones of Hooker, more florid brilliancy in the Asiatic exuberance of Jeremy Taylor, more splendor and sublimity in the pealing notes of the loftier strains of Milton's prose, more erudite quaintness and startling suggestion in the strange and exotic fascinations of Sir Thomas Brown, more pliability and unexpected magnificence in Edmund Burke, more gorgeous coruscations of endless antithesis in Macaulay; but they are all unlike the majestic but courtly pomp of the Baconian expression. Moreover, Bacon is not merely distinguished thus broadly from the style of all other writers of English prose by these salient points of difference, but he is singular in the perfect uniformity of his strain. Whether he is paying a compliment to his haughty Tudor Queen, or to his pedantic Stuart King-addressing Puckering, Coke, Buckingham, Essex, or Tobie Matthews-whether writing an apothegm, a scientific experiment, a philosophic reflection, an indictment, a state paper, an act of legislation, a parliamentary harangue, an address in chancery, a decision, or a friendly letter, there is always the same staid and imposing dignity in his utterance, which moves on like the ostentatious progress of an Eastern monarch. His rhetoric is always on parade, never in a fatigue jacket. There is no chance, no pliancy in it, notwithstanding all the diversity of the subjects treated in his surviving writings. Could such a writer adopt, in consequence of the range and compass of his genius, the Protean variety, the spontaneous facility, the unconscious grace of Shakespeare? Whatever disguise might be assumed, the voice would remain the voice of Jacob, even if the hands appeared to be the hands of Esau.

The style of Shakespeare is as characteristic and unique as that of Bacon. It is, for the most part, peculiarly simple, natural, and without pretension. It is sometimes involved and obscure, either from the complexity of the thought or from typographical and other negligences; but it generally flows with the same unaffected grace which should characterize the habitual intercourse of the parties to the dialogue. It is singularly variable, adapting its vocabulary, its combinations, its rhythms to the intellectual and social grade of the speakers. Yet, with this unconstrained and changeless versatility, it always bears upon it the impress of the great author and the poetic imagination by which it has been moulded. On every page may be detected Shakespeare's sign manual, but his image and superscription are entirely diverse from the coinage of the Lord High Chancellor of England. Both are stars of the first magnitude—the central suns of independent systems. Both shine with an unborrowed lustre of their own; but the radiance is dissimilar in color, in significance, and in effect; and the dissimilarity evidently proceeds, not from the diversity of the objects upon which the light falls, nor from any consequences of intellectual refraction, but from the original difference of constitution in the luminous bodies themselves, and from the unlike composition of the illuminating rays.

There are so many points of contrast between Shakespeare and Bacon, there is so much that may be said upon the multiplied diversities by which they are distinguished from each other, there is such a fascination in the splendors of each, that this investigation might be indefinitely prolonged. We are obliged to renounce any further expansion of the argument, having brought forward, as we believe, abundant evidence to prove that Shakespeare was Shakespeare and Bacon Bacon, and that neither Bacon nor Raleigh, nor anyone else, was capable of assuming the office and executing the tasks of shakespeare.

Neither Miss Delia Bacon nor Judge Holmes is likely to attract many proselytes to their bold heresy. It will be rejected by the instincts of those who have little leisure or inclination to examine into the petty details and circumstances of the Elizabethan period; it will be repudiated at once by the accurate knowledge of those who are at home amid the changeful scenes of that romantic age. But the audacity of the delusion which is espoused by these ingenious writers is calculated to perplex and bewilder our judgment of both the authors and their times—and there are so many interesting subjects implicated in the consideration of the thesis, so much illustration of the genuis of both the great literary names thus brought into competition, that we have been tempted to investigate the question, with the hope of affording some satisfaction by throwing new light upon the career of both Bacon and Shakespeare.

LETTER TO AGASSIZ

August 31, 1854.

To Professor Louis Agassiz, Harvard University.

DEAR SIR:

Without pretending to estimate the value of the information, I take the liberty of communicating to you two facts which may be of interest to you, and which you will know how to turn to account if hitherto unknown and of any value. In this valley and frequenting the trees around one of the houses on this farm there is a white robin. It is very gentle and has been often seen by myself, all the members of my family and others. Instead of the ordinary red-breast it is white on the throat, breast and belly. The back is also white, the head blackish, and the scapulare and wing feathers of a deep slate colour. In form and other characteristics it is a genuine Robin. It is not tame enough to be caught, and it is too much of a pet with the children to be shot. I have heard of another instance lies, like the white deer seen here sometimes-and not even varieties.

The other fact which I would communicate is the existence near Cumberland Mountains in this county of a jumping mouse, which uses its tail like a kangaroo in locomotion and clears about six feet in each bound. It has been previously heard of and was recently seen by my brother-in-law. He tried to catch it, but it easily outstripped him. From his description its appearance seems to approximate to that of the Jerboa, but it is smaller, being only of the size of a common mouse. Its colour is dark brown, the shade of the darker streak on a ground squirrel's side. The animal is very rare, but I will endeavour to have one caught and sent to you. I cannot now tell you even whether it is a marsupial like the kangaroo or a rodent like the Jerboa, but I suppose the latter. I am too little of a naturalist to know with any certainty whether these are novelties which I report or not, but I apprize you of them under the former supposition.

Absence from home, and constant occupation while at home, have prevented me from collecting for you hitherto the fishes of this county, but if I should remain here another year I shall then be more favorably circumstanced in all respects, and especially for this transmission, as the Railroad will be completed to Wytheville, which is only thirty-five miles from us. Permit me to express the deep interest which I feel in your great undertaking, and to hope that you are receiving to a satisfactory extent the assistance and cooperation you require. Accept my acknowledgments for your Pamphlet on some Extraordinary Fishes from California, which you were kind enough to address to me at Richmond last Fall. If you have any of your circulars of the preservation of specimens, you would oblige me by sending a few to me, as I could probably make them serviceable to you by distribution among my friends.

I have the honor to subscribe myself, With high respect and admiration, Your Obdt. Servt.

GEORGE FREDERICK HOLMES.

JOHNSON JONES HOOPER

[1815-1862]

C. ALPHONSO SMITH

"LIVING or dead," says Professor W. P. Trent,* "our humorists have been the benefactors of their people. It may suggest a coarse taste, it may even be uncritical, as superfine criticism now goes, to maintain that their work is an integral and not the least valuable part of American literature; but, however this may be, it seems safe to prophesy that whenever America ceases to produce good humorists, and men and women ready to smile and laugh with them, the country will cease to be the great nation that now engages our love and pride."

That America owes a debt to her humorists no thoughtful student of our history can question. From Benjamin Franklin to Mark Twain they have been the foes of pretension, duplicity, ignorance, moroseness, and braggadocio. They have laughed out of existence many a vice and pricked the bubble of many a foible that the logician and moralist either ignored or found too elusive to cope with.

But to analyze American humor is far more difficult than to appreciate it. Colonel Watterson divides it into "that which relates to fighting and that which relates to money." Professor Trent finds its source in incongruity, an incongruity that reappears in varied forms at each new turn of our history. He places Johnson Jones Hooper among the "provincial group" of humorists, whose specialty it is to depict local oddities. "It is hard," he says, "to assign the palm among these Southwestern humorists. 'Sut Lovingood,' 'Captain Simon Suggs,' 'Major Jones,' and 'Ned Brace' are all worthies whom it is well to have known at one time or another, provided one is not squeamish or puritanical. Captain Suggs, the creation of Johnson J. Hooper, was a blackleg such as only the new Cotton States of those turbulent times could have furnished, and is fairly worthy of comparison with Jonathan Wild himself, although he would have certainly worsted Fielding's hero at sevenup or in a 'horse-swap.'"

It will hardly be denied that incongruity in some of its protean shapes lies at the basis of American humor. It lies at the basis of all humor, if humor be not too sharply differentiated from wit. But the "Southwestern humorists" whom Professor Trent groups as provincial are united by a still closer bond. Their humor is distinctly the humor of discomfiture. It is an ancient, primitive, anti-social kind of merry-making, but in the evolution of universal humor deserves the attention of the student. It counts among its trophies Chaucer's "Miller's Tale," Cervantes's "Don Quixote," Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" and "Merry Wives," Burns's "Tam o' Shanter," Cowper's "John Gilpin's Ride," and a hundred other masterpieces widely divergent in style but sounding equally and unmistakably the note of humorous discomfiture.

Hooper was born in Wilmington, North Carolina, in June, 1815, and died in Richmond, Virginia, June 7, 1862. His father was a journalist of good standing and his mother traced her lineage directly to the great Jeremy Taylor. At the age of fifteen young Hooper was writing for publication. Moving early to Alabama, he began the practice of law, and was at different times editor of the Chambers County Times, the Alabama Journal, and the Montgomery Mail. In 1846 the Appletons published his greatest work, 'Some Adventures of Captain Simon Suggs, late of the Tallapoosa Volunteers, together with Taking the Census and other Alabama Sketches.' It was signed "By a Country Editor." Five years later appeared 'Widow Rugby's Husband and other tales of Alabama.'

It was John G. Saxe who said, or sang,

"O, what a serious thing it is To be a funny man!"

and Hooper was to feel the truth of the lines in more ways than one. He was sometimes hailed in large dignified assemblies as "Mr. Suggs" and called upon for a side-splitting speech, a kind of speech which he could not deliver and would not if he could. In fact he became at such times an example of the personal discomfiture which, on a lower plane, he knew so well how to portray in others.

"It is probably too late," he once remarked after a disastrous experience of this sort in Montgomery, "to rectify the blunder, and I must continue to suffer the consequences."

In February, 1861, he was elected secretary of the Provisional Confederate Congress in session at Montgomery and held office until the Congress was formally organized in Richmond. He ran for permanent Secretary of State under the new Confederate government, but was defeated. His reputation was national; but unfortunately it was that chiefly of a jocular entertainer, and the times were too serious for the framers of the new régime to take any chances. He did not return to Alabama, but died in Richmond a few months later, in the prime of his life.

"Mr. Hooper," says Colonel Watterson, "was a most genial and entertaining person, and the central figure of a brilliant coterie of writers and speakers. Of these S. S. Prentiss and George D. Prentice were the most conspicuous, and they always regarded him and spoke of him as their peer." His reputation as a storyteller or rather as a portrait painter rests chiefly on his 'Adventures of Captain Simon Suggs.' Thackeray praised the book, and selections from it have been republished, a new edition appearing in 1881. As a swashbuckler, card-sharp, and professional dead-beat, Suggs is as clear cut a figure as is to be found in the whole field of American humor,*

THE CAPTAIN IS ARRAIGNED BEFORE A JURY

From 'Captain Simon Suggs's Adventures'.

For a year or two after the Captain's conversion at the camp-meeting, the memoranda at our command furnish no information concerning him. We next find him at the spring term of 1838 arraigned in the circuit court for the county of Tallapoosa, charged in a bill of indictment with gambling—"playing at a certain game of cards commonly called Poker, for money, contrary to the form of the statute, and against the peace and dignity of the State of Alabama."

"Humph!" said the Captain to himself, as Mr. Solicitor Belcher read the bill, "that's as derned a lie as ever Jim Belcher writ! Thar never were a peaceabler or more gentlemanlier game o' short cards played in Datesville—which thar's a dozen men here is knowin' to it!"

Captain Suggs had no particular defence with which to meet the prosecution. It was pretty generally understood that the State would make out a pretty clear case against him: and a considerable fine—or imprisonment in default of its payment—was the certainly expected result. Yet Simon had employed—though he had not actually feed—counsel, and had some slight hope that Luck, the goddess of his especial adoration, would not desert him at the pinch. He instructed his lawyer, therefore, to stave off the case if possible; or at any rate to protract it.

^{*}For other sketches of Hooper the reader is referred to Colonel Watterson's 'Oddities in Southern Life and Character' (1883), pp. 39-40, Link's 'Pioneers of Southern Literature' (1896), No. 9, pp. 505-524, Garrett's 'Public Men in Alabama,' and all the larger histories of Southern literature. Selections from his works are given by Colonel Watterson, and by William E. Burton in his 'Cyclopaedia of Wit and Humor' (1858).

"The State against Simon Suggs and Andrew, alias Andy Owens. Card-playing. Hadenskeldt for the defense. Are the defendants in court?" said the judge.

Simon's counsel intimated that he was.

"Take an alias writ as to Owens—ready for trial as to Suggs;" said the solicitor.

The Captain whispered to his lawyer, and urged him to put him on the stand, and make a showing for a continuance; but being advised by that gentleman that it would be useless, got him to obtain leave for him to go out of court for five minutes. Permission obtained, he went out and soon after returned.

"Is Wat Craddock in court?" asked the solicitor.

"Here!" said Wat.

"Take the stand, Mr. Craddock!" and Wat obeyed and was sworn.

"Proceed, Mr. Craddock, and tell the court and jury all you know about Captain Suggs's playing cards," said Mr. Belcher.

"Stop!" interposed Simon's counsel; "do you believe in the revelations of Scripture, Mr. Craddock?"

"No!" said the witness.

"I object then to his testifying," said Mr. Hadenskeldt.

"He doesn't understand the question," said the solicitor; "you believe the Bible to be true, don't you?" addressing the witness.

"If the court please—stop! stop! Mr. Craddock—I'll ask him another question before he answers that"—said Mr. Hadenskeldt hastily—"did you ever read the Bible, Mr. Craddock?"

"No," said Craddock; "not's I know on."

"Then I object to his testifying, of course; he can't believe what he knows nothing about."

"He has heard it read, I presume," said Mr. Belcher; "have you not, Mr. Craddock?"

"I mought," said Wat, "but I don't know."

"Don't know! Why don't you hear it every Sunday at church?"

"Ah, but you see," replied Mr. Craddock, with the air of a man about to solve a difficulty to everybody's satisfaction—"You see I don't never go to meetin'."

"Your honor will perceive-" began Mr. Hadenskeldt.

"Why—what—how do you spend your time on Sunday, Mr. Craddock?" asked the solicitor.

"Sometimes I goes a-fishin on the krick, and sometimes I plays marvels," replied Wat, gaping extensively as he spoke.

"Anything else?"

"Sometimes I lays in the sun, back o' Andy Owenses grocery."

"Mr. Belcher," said the court, "is this the only witness for the state?"

We have a half-dozen more who can prove all the facts."

"Well, then, discharge this man—he's drunk."

Mr. Craddock was accordingly discharged, and William Sentell was put up on the stand. Just as he had kissed the book, a man, looking hot and worried, was seen leaning over the railing which shuts out the spectators from the business part of the court-room, beckoning to the Captain.

Simon having obtained leave to see this person, went to him and took a note which the other held in his hand; and after a few words of conversation, turned off to read it. As he slowly deciphered the words, his countenance changed and he began to weep. The solicitor, who knew a thing or two about the Captain, laughed; and so did Mr. Hadenskeldt, although he tried to suppress it.

"My boys is a-dyin!" said Suggs; and he threw himself upon the steps leading to the judge's seat, and sobbed bitterly.

"Come, come, Captain," said the solicitor; "you are a great tactician, but permit me to say that I know you. Come, no shamming; let's proceed with the trial."

"It don't make no odds to me now, what you do about it— John and Ben will be in their graves before I git home;" and the poor fellow groaned heart-breakingly. "Captain," said Mr. Hadenskeldt, vainly endeavoring to control his risibles, "let us attend to the trial now; maybe it isn't as bad as you suppose."

"No," said Suggs, "let 'em find me guilty. I'm a poor missuble old man! The Lord's a-punishin my gray hairs for my wickedness!"

Mr. Hadenskeldt took from the Captain's hand the note containing the bad tidings, and to his great astonishment saw that it was from Dr. Jourdan, a gentleman well known to him, and entirely above any suspicion of trickery. It set forth that the Captain's sons were at the point of death—one of them beyond hope; and urged the Captain to come home to his afflicted family. Knowing that Suggs was really an affectionate father, he was at no loss to account for the naturalness of his grief, which he had before supposed to be simulated. He instantly read the note aloud, and remarked that he would throw himself upon the humanity of the State's counsel for a continuance.

Simon interposed—"Never mind," he sobbed, "'Squire Hadenskeldt—never mind—let 'em try me. I'll plead guilty. The boys will be dead before I could git home anyhow! Let 'em send me to jail whar thar won't be nobody to laugh at my misry!"

"Has this poor old man ever been indicted before?" asked the judge.

"Never," said the solicitor, who was affected almost to tears—"he has the reputation of being dissipated and tricky, but I think has never been in court, at the instance of the state, before."

"Ah, well then, Mr. Belcher," replied the judge, "I would 'nol. pros.' the case, if I were you, and let this grief-stricken old man go home to his dying children. He is indicted only for a misdemeanor, and it would be absolute inhumanity to keep him here; perhaps that lenity might have a good effect, too."

This was all the solicitor wished for. He was already burning to strike the case off the docket and send Simon home; for he was one of the men that could never look real grief in the face without a tear in his eye—albeit his manner was as rough as a Russian bear's.

So the solicitor entered his nolle prosequi, and the Captain was informed that he was at liberty.

"May it please your honor, judge," said he, picking up his hat, "and all you other kind gentlemen"—his case had excited universal commiseration among the lawyers—"that's taken pity on a poor broken-sperrited man—God bless you all for it—it's all I can say or do!" He then left the court-house.

In the course of an hour or two the solicitor had occasion to go to his room for a paper or book he had left there. On his way to the tavern, he observed Captain Suggs standing in front of a "grocery," in great glee, relating some laughable anecdote. He was astounded. He called to him, and the Captain came.

"Captain Suggs," said the solicitor, "how's this? Why are you not on your way home?" And the solicitor frowned like—as only he can frown.

"Why bless my soul, Jim," said Suggs familiarly, and with a wicked smile, "ain't you hearn about it? These here boys in town"—here Simon himself frowned savagely—I'll be d——d into an orful h—ll, ef I don't knock daylight outen some on 'em—a-sportin wi' my feelins, that way! They'd better mind—jokin's jokin, but I've known men most hellatiously kicked for jist sich jokes!"

"Well, well," said Mr. Belcher, who more than suspected that he had been "sold"—"how was it?"

"You see," quoth Simon, "it was this here way, adzactly—that note I got in the court-house was one Dr. Jourdan sent me last summer, when the boys was sick, and I was on a spree over to Sockapatoy—only I didn't know 'twas the same. It must 'a drapped outen my pocket here, somehow, and some of these town boys picked it up, tore off the date at the bottom, and sent it to me up thar—which, my feelins was never hurt as bad before, in the round world. But they'd better mind who they poke thar fun at! No-o man aint got to sport wi' my feelins that way, and let me find him out!—Won't you take some sperrits, Jim?"

The solicitor turned off wrathfully, and walked away. Simon watched him as he went. "Thar," said he, "goes as clever a feller as ever toted a ugly head! He's smart, too, d—d smart; but thar's some people he can't qu-u-i-te, ad-zact-ly—" and without finishing the sentence, Captain Suggs pulled down the lower lid of his left eye with the forefinger of his right hand; and having thus impliedly complimented himself, he walked back to the grocery.

TAKING THE CENSUS

"Taking the Census" occupies forty-three pages in 'Captain Simon Suggs's Adventures.' It is a mere insertion, Simon having nothing to do with the census. C. A. S.

THE collection of statistical information concerning the resources and industry of the country, by the assistant marshals who were employed to take the last census, was a very difficult work. The popular impression, that a tremendous tax would soon follow the minute investigation of the private affairs of the people, caused the census-taker to be viewed in no better light than that of a tax-gatherer; and the consequence was, that the information sought by him was either withheld entirely, or given with great reluctance. The returns, therefore, made by the marshals, exhibit a very imperfect view of the wealth and industrial progress of the country. In some portions of the country the excitement against the unfortunate officers—who were known as the "chicken men"—made it almost dangerous for them to proceed with the business of taking the census; and bitter were the taunts, threats, and abuse which they received at all hands, but most particularly from the old women of the country. The dear old souls could not bear to be catechised about the produce of their looms, poultry yards, and dairies; and when they did "come down" upon the unfortunate inquisitor, it was with a force and volubility that were sure to leave an impression. We speak from experience, and feelingly, on this subject; for it so happened, that the Marshal of the Southern District of Alabama, "reposing special confidence" in our ability, invested us one day with all the powers of assistant marshal; and arming us with the proper quantity of blanks, sent us forth to count the noses of all the men, women, and children, and chickens resident upon those nine hundred square miles of rough country which constitute the county of Tallapoosa. Glorious sport! thought we; but it didn't turn out so. True, we escaped without any drubbings, although we came unpleasantly near catching a dozen, and only escaped by a very peculiar knack we have of "sliding out"; but then we were quizzed, laughed at, abused, and nearly drowned. Children shouted "Yonder goes the chicken man!" Men said, "Yes, d—n him, he'll be after the taxes soon;"—and the old women threatened, if he came to inquire about their chickens, "to set the dogs on him," while the young women observed "they didn't know what a man wanted to be so pertic'lar about gals' ages for, without he was a gwine a-courtin'." We have some reminiscences of our official peregrinations that will do to laugh at now, although the occurrences with which they are connected were, at the time, anything but mirth-inspiring to us.

We rode up one day to the residence of a widow rather past the prime of life—just that period at which nature supplies most abundantly the oil which lubricates the hinges of the female tongue—and hitching to the fence, walked into the house.

"Good morning, madam," said we, in our usual bland and somewhat insinuating manner.

"Mornin'," said the widow gruffly.

Drawing our blanks from their case, we proceeded—"I am the man, madam, that takes the census, and—"

"The mischief you are!" said the old termagant. "Yes, I've hearn of you; Parson W. told me you was coming, and I told him jist what I tell you, that if you said 'cloth,' 'soap,' ur 'chickens,' to me, I'd sets the dogs on ye! Here, Bull, here, Pomp!" Two wolfish curs responded to the call for Bull and Pomp, by coming to the door, smelling at our feet with a slight growl, and then lay down on the steps. "Now," continued the old she savage, "them's the severest dogs in this country. Last week Bill Stonecker's two year old steer jumped my yard fence, and Bull and Pomp took him by the throat, and killed him afore my boys could break 'em loose, to save the world."

"Yes, ma'am," said we, meekly; "Bull and Pomp seem to be very fine dogs."

"You may well say that; what I tells them to do they do—and if I was to sick them on your old hoss yonder, they'd eat him up afore you could say Jack Roberson. And it's jist what I shall do, if you try to pry into my consarns. They are none of your business, nor Van Buren's nuther, I reckon. Oh, old

Van Banburen! I wish I had you here, you old rascal! I'd show you what—I'd—I'd make Bull and Pomp show you how to be sendin' out men to take down what little stuff people's got, jist to tax it, when it's taxed enough a'ready!"

All this time we were perspiring through fear of the fierce guardians of the old widow's portal. At length, when the widow paused, we remarked that as she was determined not to answer questions about the produce of the farm, we would just set down the age, sex, and complexion of each member of her family.

"No sich a thing—you'll do no sich a thing," she said. "I've got five in family, and that's all you'll git from me. Old Van Buren must have a heap to do, the dratted old villyan, to send you to take down how old my children is. I've got five in family, and they are all between five and a hundred years old; they are all a plaguy sight whiter than you, and whether they are he or she is none of your consarns."

We told her we would report her to the Marshal, and she would be fined; but it only augmented her wrath.

"Yes! send your marshal, or your Mr. Van Buren here, if you're bad off to—let 'em come"—and her nostrils dilated, and her eyes gleamed—"I'd cut his head off!"

"That might kill him," we ventured to remark, by way of a joke.

"Kill him! kill him—Oh—if I had him here by the years I would kill him. A pretty fellow to be eating his vittils out'n gold spoons that poor people's taxed for, and raisin' an army to get him made king of Ameriky—the oudacious, nasty, stinking old scamp!" She paused a moment, and then resumed, "And now, mister, jist put down what I tell you on that paper, and don't be telling no lies to send to Washington City. Jist put down 'Judy Tompkins, ageable woman, and four children."

We objected to making any such entry, but the old woman vowed it should be done, to prevent any misrepresentation of her case. We, however, were pretty resolute, until she appealed to the couchant whelps, Bull and Pomp. At the first glimpse of their teeth, our courage gave way, and we made the entry in a bold hand across a blank schedule—"Judy Tompkins, ageable woman and four children."

We now begged the old lady to dismiss her canine friends, that we might go out and depart; and forthwith mounting our old black, we determined to give the old soul a parting fire. Turning half around, in order to face her, we shouted—

"Old 'oman!"

"Who told you to call me old 'oman, you long-legged, hatchet-faced whelp, you? I'll make the dogs take you off that horse if you give me any more sarse. What do you want?"

"Do you want to get married?"

"Not to you, if I do!"

"Placing our right thumb on the nasal extremity of our countenance, we said, "You needn't be uneasy, old 'un, on that score—thought you might suit sore-legged Dick S—— up our way, and should like to know what to tell him he might count on, if he come down next Sunday!"

"Here, Bull!" shouted the widow, "sick him, Pomp!" but we cantered off, unwounded, fortunately, by the fangs of Bull and Pomp, who kept up the chase as long as they could hear the cheering voice of their mistress—"Si-c-k, Pomp—sick, sick, si-c-k him, Bull—subov! subov!"

Our next adventure was decidedly a dangerous one. Fording the Tallapoosa river, where its bed is extremely uneven, being formed of masses of rock full of fissures, and covered with slimy green moss, when about two-thirds of the way across, we were hailed by Sol Todd from the bank we were approaching. We stopped to hear him more distinctly.

"Hellow! little 'squire, you a-chicken hunting to-day?"

Being answered affirmatively, he continued—"You better mind the holes in them ere rocks—if your horse's foot gits ketched in 'em you'll never git it out. You see that big black rock down to your right? Well there's good bottom down below that. Strike down thar, outside that little riffle—and now cut right into that smooth water and come across!"

We followed Sol's direction to the letter, and plunging into the smooth water, we found it to be a basin surrounded with steep ledges of rock, and deep enough to swim the horse we rode. Round and round the poor old black toiled without finding any place at which he could effect a landing, so precipitous were the sides. Sol occasionally asked us "if the bottom wasn't first rate," but did nothing to help us. At last we scrambled out, wet and chilled to the bone—for it was a sharp September morning—and continued our journey, not a little annoyed by the boisterous, roaring laughter of the said Solomon, at our picturesque appearance.

We hadn't more than got out of hearing of Sol's cachinnatory explosions, before we met one of his neighbours, who gave us to understand that the ducking we had just received was but the fulfilment of a threat of Sol's, to make the "chicken-man" take a swim in the "Buck Hole." He had heard of our stopping on the opposite side of the river the night previous, and learning our intention to ford just where we did, fixed himself on the bank to insure our finding the way into the "Buck Hole."

This information brought our nap right up, and requesting Bill Splawn to stay where he was till we returned, we galloped back to Sol's, and found that worthy, rod on shoulder, ready to leave on a fishing excursion.

"Sol, old fellow," said we, "that was a most unfortunate lunge I made into that hole in the river—I've lost twenty-five dollars in specie out of my coat pocket, and I'm certain it's in that hole, for I felt my pocket get light while I was scuffling about in there. The money was tied up tight in a buckskin pouch, and I must get you to help me get it out."

This, of course, was a regular old-fashioned lie, as we had not seen the amount of cash mentioned as lost in a "coon's age." It took, however, pretty well; and Sol concluded, as it was a pretty cold spell of weather for the season, and the water was almost like ice, that half the contents of the buckskin pouch would be just about fair for recovering it. After some chaffering, we agreed that Sol should dive for the money "on shares," and we went down with him to the river, to point out the precise spot at which our pocket "grew light." We did so with anxious exactness, and Sol soon denuded himself and went under the water in the "Buck Hole," "like a shuffler duck with his wing broke." Puff! puff! as he rose to the surface. "Got it, Sol? No, dang it, here goes again"—and Sol disappeared a second time. Puff! puff! and a considerable rattle of teeth as Sol once more rose into "upper air." "What luck, old horse?" "By jings, I felt it that time, but somehow it slid out of my fingers." Down went Sol again, and up he came after the lapse of a minute, still without the pouch. "Are you right sure, 'squire, that you lost it in this hole?" said Sol, getting out upon a large rock, while the chattering of his teeth divided his words into rather more than their legitimate number of syllables. "Oh perfectly certain, Sol, perfectly certain. You know twenty-five dollars in hard money weigh a pound or two. I didn't mention the circumstance when I first came out of the river, because I was so scared and confused that I didn't remember it—but I know just as well when the pouch broke through my coat pocket, as can be!"

Thus reassured, Sol took to the water again, and as we were in a hurry, we requested him to bring the pouch and half the money to Dadeville, if his diving should prove successful.

"To be sure I will," said he, and his blue lips quivered with cold, and his whole frame shook from the same cause.

The "river ager" made Sol shake worse than that, that fall. But we left him diving for the pouch industriously, and no doubt he would have got it, if it had been there!

Once as we were about to leave a house at which we had put up the night previous, one of the girls—a buxom one of twenty—followed us to the fence, and the following tête-à-tête ensued:

"Now, 'squire, they say you know, and I want you to tell me, ef you please—what will chickens be worth this fall?"

"How many have you?"

"The rise of seventy, and three hens a-settin'!"

"Well now, Miss Betsy," said we, "you know how much I set by the old man, your daddy—and the old lady, you know she and me always got along—and Jim and Dave, you know we was always like brothers—and yourself, Miss Betsy, I consider my particular friend—and as it's you, I'll tell you!"

"Do, 'squire, ef you please; they say Van Buren's going to feed his big army on fowls; and some folks say he's going to take 'em without payin' for 'em, and some say he ain't—and I thought in course, ef he did pay for 'em, the price would rise!"

"Well, the fact is—but don't say nothing about it—the army is to be fed on fowls; the roosters will be given to the officers to make 'em brave, and the hens to common soldiers; because, you see, they ain't as good."

"In course!"

"So, you see, the hens will be worth about three bits, and roosters a half a dollar, and ready sale at that."

She was perfectly delighted, and we do not hesitate to say, would have rewarded us with a kiss, if we had asked it; but in those days modesty was the bright trait in our character. As it was, she only insisted on our taking "a bit of something cold" in our saddle-bags, in case we should reach town too late for dinner.

Our next encounter was with an old lady notorious in her neighbourhood for her garrulity and simple-mindedness. Her loquacity knew no bounds; it was constant, unremitting, interminable, and sometimes laughably silly. She was interested in quite a large chancery suit which had been "dragging its slow length along" for several years, and furnished her with a conversational fund which she drew upon extensively, under the idea that its merits could never be sufficiently discussed. Having been warned of her propensity, and being somewhat hurried when we called upon her, we were disposed to get through business as soon as possible, and without hearing her enumeration of the strong points of her law case. Striding into the house, and drawing our papers—

"Taking the census, ma'am!" quoth we.

"Ah! well! bless your soul, honey, take a seat. Now do! Are you the gentlemen that Mr. Van Buren has sent out to take the sensis? I wonder! well, good Lord look down, how was Mr. Van Buren and family when you seed him?"

We explained that we had never seen the President; didn't "know him from a side of sole leather;" and we had been written to, to take the census.

"Well, now, thar agin! Love your soul! Well, I s'pose Mr. Van Buren writ you a letter, did he? No? Well, I suppose some of his officers done it—bless my soul? Well, God be praised, there's mighty little here to take down—times is hard, God's will be done; but looks like people can't git their jest rights in this country; and the law is all for the rich and none for the poor, praise the Lord. Did you ever hear tell of that case my boys has got agin old Simpson? Looks like they never will git to the end on it; glory to His name! The children will suffer I'm mightily afeerd; Lord give us grace. Did you ever see Judge B—? Yes? Well, the Lord preserve us!

Did you ever hear him say what he was agwine to do in the boys' case agin Simpson? No! Good Lord! Well, 'squire, will you ax him the next time you see him, and write me word; and tell him what I say; I'm nothing but a poor widow, and my boys has got no larnin, and old Simpson tuk 'em in. It's a mighty hard case on my boys any how. They ought to ha' had a mighty good start, all on 'em; but God bless you, that old man has used 'em up twell they ain't able to buy a creetur to plough with. It's a mighty hard case, and the will oughtn't never to a been broke, but—"

Here we interposed and told the old lady that our time was precious—that we wished to take down the number of her family, and the produce raised by her last year, and be off. After a good deal of trouble we got through with the descriptions of the members of her family, and the "statistical table" as far as the article "cloth."

"How many yards of cotton cloth did you weave in 1840, ma'am?"

"Well, now! The Lord have mercy!—less see! You know Sally Higgins that used to live down in the Smith settlement?—poor thing, her daddy druv her off on the 'count of her havin' a little 'un, poor creetur!—poor gal, she couldn't help it, I dare say. Well, Sally she come to stay 'long with me when the old man druv her away, and she was a powerful good hand to weave, and I did think she'd help me a power. Well, arter she'd been here awhile, her baby hit took sick, and old Miss Stringer she undertuk to help it—she's a powerful good hand, old Miss Stringer, on roots, and yearbs, and sich like! Well, the Lord look down from above! She made a sort of a tea, as I was a-saying, and she gin it to Sally's baby, but it got wuss—the poor creetur—and she gin it tea, and gin it tea, and looked like, the more she gin it tea, the more—"

"My dear madam, I am in a hurry—please tell me how many yards of cotton cloth you wove in 1840, I want to get through with you and go on."

"Well, well, the Lord-a-mercy! who'd a thought you'd 'a bin so snappish! Well, as I was a' sayin', Sall's child hit kept a gittin' wuss, and old Miss Stringer, she kept a givin' it the yearb tea twell at last the child hit looked like hit would die any how. And 'bout the time the child was at its wust, old Daddy Sykes he come along, and he said if we'd git some night-shed berries, and stew 'em with a little cream and some hog's lard—now old Daddy Sykes is a mighty fine old man, and he gin the boys a heap of mighty good counsel about that case—boys, says he, I'll tell you what you do; you go—"

"In God's name, old lady," said we, "tell about your cloth, and let the sick child and Miss Stringer, Daddy Sykes, the boys, and the law suit go to the devil. I'm in a hurry!"

"Gracious bless your dear soul! don't git aggrawated. I was jist a tellin' you how it come I didn't weave no cloth last year."

"Oh, well, you didn't weave any cloth last year. Good!

We'll go on to the next article."

"Yes! you see the child hit begun to swell and turn yaller, and hit kept wallin' its eyes and a moanin', and I knowed—"

"Never mind about the child—just tell me the value of the poultry you raised last year."

"Oh, well—yes—the chickens you mean. Why, the Lord love your poor soul, I reckon you never in your born days seen a poor creetur have the luck I did—and looks like we never shall have good luck agin; for ever sence old Simpson tuk that case up to the chancery court—"

"Never mind the case; let's hear about the chickens, if you please."

"God bless you, honey, the owls destroyed in and about the best half what I did raise. Every blessed night the Lord sent, they'd come and set on the comb of the house, and hoohoo, and one night particklar, I remember, I had jist got up to get the night-shed salve to 'nint the little gal with—"

"Well, well, what was the value of what you did raise?"

"The Lord above look down! They got so bad—the owls did—that they tuk the old hens, as well's the young chickens. The night I was telling 'bout, I hearn somethin' squall! squall! and says, I'll bet that's old Speck that nasty oudacious owl's got; for I seen her go to roost with her chickens, up in the plum tree, fornenst the smoke house. So I went to whar old Miss Stringer was sleepin', and says I, Miss Stringer! Oh! Miss Stringer! sure's you born, that stinkin' owl's got old Speck out'n the plum tree; well, old Miss Stringer she turned over

'pon her side like, and says she, what did you say, Miss Stokes? and says I—"

We began to get very tired, and signified the same to the old lady, and begged she would answer us directly, and without circumlocution.

"The Lord Almighty love your dear heart, honey, I'm tellin' you as fast as I kin. The owls they got worse and worse, and after they'd swept old Speck and all her gang, they went to work on 'tothers; and Bryant (that's one of my boys,) he 'lowed he shoot the pestersome creeture—and so one night arter that, we hearn one holler, and Bryant, he tuk the old musket and went out, and sure enough, there was owley, (as he thought,) a-settin' on the comb of the house, so he blazed away and down come—what on airth did come down, do you reckon; when Bryant fired?"

"The owl, I suppose."

"No sich a thing, no sich! the owl warn't thar. 'Twas my old house-cat come a tumblin' down, spittin', sputterin', and scratchin', and the fur a flyin' every time she jumped, like you'd a busted a feather bed open! Bryant he said, the way he come to shoot the cat instead of the owl, he seed something white—"

"For Heaven's sake Mrs. Stokes, give me the value of your poultry, or say you will not! Do one thing or the other."

"Oh, well, dear love your heart, I reckon I had last year nigh about the same as I've got this."

"Then tell me how many dollars' worth you have now, and the thing's settled."

"I'll let you see for yourself," said the widow Stokes, and taking an ear of corn out of a crack behind the logs of the cabin, and shelling off a handful, she commenced scattering the grain, all the while screaming, or rather screeching—"chick-chick-chick-ee-chick-ee-chick-ee-ee!"

Here they came, roosters, and hens, and pullets, and little chicks—crowing, cackling, chirping; flying and fluttering over beds, chairs, and tables; alighting on the old woman's head and shoulders, fluttering against her sides, pecking at her hands, and creating a din and confusion altogether indescribable. The old lady seemed delighted, thus to exhibit her feathered

"stock," and would occasionally exclaim—"a nice passel, ain't they—a nice passel!" But she never would say what they were worth; no persuasion could bring her to the point; and our papers at Washington contain no estimate of the value of the widow Stokes's poultry, though, as she said herself, she had "a mighty nice passel!"

WILLIAM HOOPER

[1792-1876]

RALPH H. GRAVES

FRIENDLY biographers of the Rev. Dr. William Hooper, carried away by their regard for a man who won recognition as a leader among Southern educators and preachers, have gone so far as to call him a literary genius. But it is a pity to detract from real achievements by exaggerated praise. What Dr. Hooper accomplished as a scholar, pulpit orator, and writer for periodicals is enough to give him a place in Southern literature, without attributing to him qualities which, though doubtless potentially within his reach, he never had an opportunity to display.

It was once said of Dr. Hooper that, had he preached or written in Boston, the whole world of books would have recognized his power. Perhaps that is true. In North Carolina, however, where his fourscore conscientious years were lived, the making of books was and is secondary. Like a thousand other powerful men of the South, he labored for duty rather than glory, and the memory of his work depends principally upon the impression he created, with only a few brief addresses and sermons preserved to attest his strength of thought and style. He was too busy, striving unostentatiously for human betterment, to build a record of genius on the printed page. That he made so deep an imprint as he did upon the educational growth of his State, without the aid of professional or money-making literary acumen, is remarkable enough in itself.

Dr. Hooper was entitled to success by right of distinguished ancestry, if that counts for anything. He was the fourth of his name. His great grandfather, William Hooper, a Scotchman, emigrated to America, became pastor of a Boston Congregational church about 1737, joined the Episcopal fold in 1746, and was the second rector of Trinity Church in Boston, from 1747 to his death in 1767. The second William Hooper, born in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, became a lawyer in Wilmington, North Carolina, and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence from North Carolina. The third William Hooper, father of this sketch, while never prominent in public life, enjoyed, with his wife, Helen Hogg Hooper, a reputation for culture and taste, along with a fondness for the inconspicuous that characterized their son.

Born in Hillsboro, North Carolina, on August 31, 1792, the fourth William Hooper early developed remarkable mental faculties. It is related that he was reading Virgil at the age of six. The story is not incredible, when one recalls that the children of educated folk a century ago were put to studying Latin almost as soon as they learned the alphabet of their own tongue. In any event the boy was startlingly precocious. He received his bachelor of arts diploma from the University of North Carolina in 1809, when but seventeen years old. Three years later he was a master of arts.

In the meantime his father had died, in 1804, and his mother had married the Rev. Dr. Joseph Caldwell, first president of the University. The young man was devoted to his stepfather, and until Dr. Caldwell's death, in 1835, they worked side by side most of the time. Hooper was appointed a tutor at the University in 1810. Except for one session spent at the Princeton Theological Seminary, he remained in that position continuously until 1817. Then he was made professor of Ancient Languages and held that chair until 1822.

Those who knew the young teacher have described him as a typical scholar, but with a fine sense of humor to offset his natural seriousness. There was a tinge of often recurring melancholy, too, in his character, and it lasted to old age. The origin of the sadness was a distressing accident of his early youth. In handling a supposedly unloaded firearm, he had shot and killed a young girl, his cousin. Nearly seventy years after the occurrence he would with tears recall to his children and grandchildren the misery of the day.

While a tutor, in 1814, he married Frances Pollock Jones, a daughter of Edward Jones, for a long time Solicitor-general of North Carolina. Two years after his promotion to the professorship, in 1819, he became a Protestant Episcopal deacon, and in 1822 he took the priest's orders. It was in the same year that he left Chapel Hill, the seat of the University, to be rector of St. John's Church in Fayetteville, but in 1824 he returned to fill the chair of Logic and Rhetoric, and in 1828 he was again in the Ancient Languages professorship, which he held until 1837.

Dr. Hooper joined the Baptist Church in 1831. Three years earlier he had been honored by the University with the degree of LL.D. In Baptist councils he was a leader from the beginning, and in 1832 he served as chairman of the church committee that started the movement to establish Wake Forest College, near Raleigh. Of that institution he became president fourteen years later, after having spent the period from 1838 to 1840 as a teacher of theology in Furman University, near Greenville, South Carolina, and the years from 1840 to 1846 as professor of Roman Literature in South Carolina College.

Leaving Wake Forest, after three years, he conducted a boys' school not far from Littleton, North Carolina, 1849-1851; occupied the pulpit of a Baptist church in New Berne, 1852-1854; was president of Chowan Female Collegiate Institute, near Murfreesboro, 1855-1861; taught in the Fayetteville Female Seminary, 1861-1865; and was associate principal of a girls' school at Wilson with his son-in-law, John De Berniere Hooper, and his son, Thomas, from 1866 to 1875. While at Murfreesboro he had received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the State University.

After the period of stagnation following the Civil War, the University was reopened in 1875. John De Berniere Hooper was chosen professor of Greek and French. With him he took to Chapel Hill his father-in-law, now grown too aged to pursue further the activity that had marked his sixty and more years of work. The venerable scholar died in Chapel Hill on August 19, 1876. In a few days more he would have been eighty-four years old.

Out of the many sermons, speeches and newspaper contributions of the Rev. Dr. William Hooper, the effort that has attracted most attention since his death is an address delivered at the University of North Carolina commencement in 1859, half a century after his graduation. He called the speech "Fifty Years Since." In it may be seen evidence of profound learning, aptness of phrase and construction, cleverness of expression, and much underlying humor.

The elegance and purity of his style, though there is a verbosity not familiar in these later days of brevity, cannot fail to excite admiration. The humor is over-scholarly, sometimes labored; but any man who could instill even a small film of wit into a discourse so carefully phrased, with classical quotations or philosophical deviations in control of almost every paragraph, must have had in his soul a well of genuine light-heartedness. Whoever reads "Fifty Years Since," and nobody can read without enjoying it, will be convinced that in Dr. Hooper was to be found the rare combination of deep study, broad thought, true wit, and friendship for humanity.

FIFTY YEARS SINCE

An address delivered before the Alumni Association of the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, June 1, 1859.

Brothers of the Alumni, Literary Children of one Alma Mater:

We come together at this annual festival, to salute and congratulate each other, to look back on the past and compare it to the present, to gratify an honest pride in contrasting the feeble and sickly infancy of our literary mother with her present vigorous maturity, and to breathe a common filial prayer that that vigorous maturity may long flourish, and not soon be succeeded by a languishing old age.

* * * * * *

The first of the 'Waverley Novels' was entitled "Sixty Years Since," which serves as a date to the origin of those wonderful compositions. My tale shall be entitled "Fifty Years Since," though some of my story will embrace incidents within forty years of the present date; and if it fall (as of course it will) infinitely below that of the renowned Sir Walter in all other respects, it will rise above him in one; that, whereas most of his is fiction, mine is sober fact. At least, I intend it to be so. But it may be with me as it was with Boswell in his celebrated 'Life of Dr. Johnson.' He tells us that it was his habit, after being in company with his hero, to go immediately to his lodgings and record the sayings and doings of the doctor at once, while they were fresh in his memory; but that sometimes, when circumstances interfered, the facts lay on his memory for a day or two, and that he thought they were the better of it, as they had a chance to grow mellow!

I hope that if any of my cœvals are present, who can look back as far into our antiquities as myself, they will not have occasion to say, when they hear some of my recitals: "There is a fact that has grown mellow in his memory," or to compare me with the aged harper in Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel":

Each blank in faithless memory void, The poet's glowing thought supplied.

It is my part then, to-day, to go back to the very incunabula of our college—the cradle of its infancy, and to call up recollections of some who rocked that cradle. And I dare say while I am telling the story of the poor and beggarly minority of our alma mater, some of her proud, saucy sons of the present generation will smile scornfully at the humility of our origin. When I tell them that the classes of President Polk; of Governors Branch, Brown, Manly, Morehead, Speight; of Judges Murphey, Cameron, Martin, Donnell, Williams, Mason, Anderson; of Senators Mangum and Haywood; of Doctors Hawks, Morrison, Green, and of many other graduates forty years back, eminent for merit though not holding office—when I tell the proud collegians of the present day that these men came out of classes consisting of nine, ten, fourteen, fifteen, the largest twenty-one, they will set up a broad laugh, and think how poor a figure a class of ten or fifteen must cut on a Commencement Day; and one will say: "Why, I graduated with seventy-five," and another: "I with one hundred," and another: "I with one hundred and ten." Well, I know of no better way to shelter myself from the storm of your ridicule than by telling you a story. "Once upon a time," says Æsop, "a fox brought out her whole brood of little foxes, and paraded them before the lioness and said: 'Look here! see what a family I have, whereas you have but one!' 'I know,' said the queen of beasts, 'that I bear but one at a time, but then he is a lion!" I would also remind you, young classics, of the story of Niobe, who boasted of her twelve children, and crowed over Latona, who had only two; but then Latona's children were the sun and moon! Forgive, young gentlemen, these boastings of an old man. You know it is the characteristic of such a one to overrate the past and underrate the present. But I trust I am sufficiently sensible of the vast advances made in all things at Chapel Hill since my day, to do full justice to the present age. You have turned the wild into a garden. You have substituted for the meager bill of fare with which our minds were obliged to content themselves, a table rich in all the stores of learning which a half century of unexampled progress has heaped upon it. I hope, therefore, when I roll back the volume of our college history, and show you "the day of small things" you will not despise too much our petty number, our humble accommodations, our rude manners, our hard fare, our scanty rations and our limited curriculum of studies. Let not > Grandeur hear, with a disdainful smile, The short and simple annals of the poor.

When I first knew Chapel Hill in January, 1804, the infant University was but about six years old. Its only finished buildings were what are now called the East Wing and the Old Chapel. The former was then only two stories high, capable of accommodating one tutor and sixty students by crowding four into a room. The faculty consisted of three: President Caldwell, Professor Bingham, and Tutor Henderson. Their college titles were "Old Joe," "Old Slick" and "Little Dick." "Old Joe," however, was only thirty years of age and possessed (as you shall hear in the sequel) a formidable share of youthful activity. "Old Slick" derived his cognomen not from age but from premature baldness, and the extreme glossiness of his naked scalp. And "Little Dick," a cousin of the late distinguished Judge Henderson, though he had a brave spirit, was not very well fitted by the size of his person to overawe the three score rude chaps over whom he was placed as solitary sentinel. As a nursery of the college there was a preparatory school, taught by Matthew Troy and Chesley Daniel. All things were fashioned after the model of Princeton College and that probably was fashioned after the model of the Scottish universities by old Dr. Witherspoon. If this were the case, it would seem to account for the small quantum of instruction provided for us, if Dr. Johnson spoke the truth when he said of Scottish education, that "there everybody got a mouthful, but nobody got a bellyful." Into this preparatory school it was my fortune to be inducted, a trembling urchin of twelve years, in the winter of 1804. It was then a barbarous custom, brought from the North, to rise at the severe season of the year before daylight and go to prayers by candle-light; and many a cold wintry morning do I recollect trudging along in the dark at the heels of Mr., afterwards Dr. Caldwell, with whom I boarded, on our way to the tutor's room to wait for the second bell. In that year I read Sallust's 'War of Jugurtha' and 'Conspiracy of Cataline,' under the tuition of Mr. Troy, of whom my recollections are affectionate, for he was partial to me, and taught me well for those times. But I can recollect some of my classmates, grown young men, upon whose backs he tried a blister-plaster, made of chinquapin bark, to quicken the torpor of the brain. Nor was he singular in his discipline. Whether boys were then duller or more idle than now, I know not, but at that time whipping was the order of the day. I had, before coming to Chapel Hill, served three years under it at Hillsboro, where Mr. Flinn wielded his terrible sceptre, and realized in our eye the description of Goldsmith:

A man severe he was and stern to view; I knew him well, and every truant knew; Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace The day's disasters in his morning face.

This was literally verified with us, when Dr. Flinn came to school on Monday morning with his head tied with a crimson handkerchief. It was the bloody flag to us, and the very skin of our backs began to tremble.

After serving such an apprenticeship at Hillsboro, the exchange for Mr. Troy's administration was like exchanging the cowhide for the willow twig, for Mr. Flinn's "little finger was thicker than Mr. Troy's loins." But now after drawing aside the pall of oblivion from these infirmities of the dead. I feel some twinges of remorse, as though I had rudely trodden on the ashes of my departed instructors; for, having been myself a teacher all my life, I ought to know how to make allowance for the trials of teachers; and if any one of you, my hearers, is accustomed to rail at the tyranny of pedagogues, and to flatter yourself with the conceit that if you were one, you would always be able to control your temper, I would only address you in the language which the advertisement uses respecting sovereign recipes: "Try it," and if in six months you don't go and hang yourself, you will, at least, have more charity for teachers all the days of your life.

Having mentioned the library of one of the literary societies, I must carry you back, ye proud Dialectics and Philanthropics of the present age, to your humble birth, and reveal to you your inglorious antecedents. It may be good for you who now loll upon sofas and survey with triumph your thousands of volumes, to look back fifty-five years and glance your eye "into the hole of the pit whence ye were digged." The Dialectic library of this college, all of it, was then contained in one of the cupboards of one of the common rooms in the East Building, and consisted of a few half-worn volumes, presented by some compassionate individuals; and I think it was in the habit of migrating from room to room, as the librarian would change, for you may be sure the responsibility of taking care of such a number of books could not be borne long by one pair of shoulders. And besides, there was some ambition to choose, as librarian, a man who could wait on the ladies with something of that courtly grace which distinguishes the marshals of this polished age. But the cavaliers of that early time, poor fellows! had to make their way to the ladies' hearts without any of the modern artillery of splendid sashes, moustaches, and goatees. The naked face, with native flush or native pallor, was all their dependence. The cupboards were not only small but full of rat holes, and a large rat might have taken his seat upon 'Rollin's History,' the corner stone of the library, and exclaimed, with Robinson Crusoe:

> I am monarch of all I survey, My title there's none to dispute.

Such was the infancy of Dialectic knowledge; such the meagre fare provided for Dialectic appetite in those primeval days.

And what is told of one library may be told of the other, for they were as much alike as the teeth of the upper and lower jaw, and as often came into collision. When one library got a book the other must have the same book, only more handsomely bound, if possible. I am sorry to record that the contest between the two societies, at that time, was not confined to an honorable competition which should have the finest library, or the best scholars; but that it often amounted to personal rancor and sometimes seemed to threaten a general battle.

The societies then had no halls of their own, but held their sessions on different nights in the week in the Old Chapel, without any fire in the winter, and besides, with the north wind pouring in through many a broken pane. Think of this, ye pampered collegians of this effeminate age, and bless your stars that your college times have come fifty years later. Before I come down to a somewhat later period, let me present you with a sketch of scenes going on under these old oaks in the year 1804, fifty-five years ago, and let me draw from memory, if I can, a picture of the Fourth of July of that year, for that was the Commencement Day—the great National festival being then the great college festival.

The waves of the Revolutionary War seemed hardly to have subsided, and hence military feeling and military habits intruded upon academic shades and mixed themselves with the peaceful pursuits of literature. The great object of display on Commencement Day was not the graduates or their speeches, but a Fourth of July oration, delivered by the General, who had been chosen by the vote of the whole body of students, preps and all, for free suffrage then prevailed, and a prep's vote was as good as anybody's. The office of General and orator of the day was, of course, an object of great ambition; and while the election was pending, we preps felt our importance considerably augmented. Like the Nile, we always began to swell about the end of June; but our inundation was soon over, not lasting longer than the Fourth of July. On these occasions the candidates would come down among us and take us in their arms and caress us most lovingly, and invite us to their rooms in college, and, I suppose, treat us there to gingercakes and cider, though as to that fact I have no distinct recollection; but all of you who are versed in the ways of candidates will admit it to be very probable that they did. As well as I recollect, there was elected besides a General or orator, the General's aide. On this occasion Thomas Brown, son of the late General Brown, of Bladen, and brother-in-law of the late Governor Owen, was elected General, and Hyder Ally Davie was second in command.

All things being duly arranged, the General, clad in full regimentals, with cocked hat and dancing red plume, placed himself at the head of his troops (for we were all turned into soldiers for the nonce) and marched up to the foot of the "Big Poplar," where was placed for him a rostrum, upon which he mounted, and, all the military disposing themselves before him, he gracefully took off his plumed helmet and made profound obeisance to the army; and if a prep's bosom ever throbbed with proud emotions and ever thrilled with anticipations of the pleasure of being a great man, our hearts felt that throb and thrill on that day. I can tell you nothing of the graduating class, or their speeches. My childish fancy was taken up with the military display, though we had no music to march to but the drum and fife. If we had had such a band as you have here to-day, it might have been too much for us—few perhaps would have survived it.

It was at this commencement, 1804, I think, that Greek was made a part of the College course. Governor Martin, if I recollect, was the proposer of the measure. "You study logic," said he, "and you don't know the word from which the term is derived." No doubt the Governor gave some better arguments, if I had been old enough to cherish them, for substituting the classics of Greece for those of France, which last had then a factitious importance and popularity from the recent splendor of Voltaire, from our late obligations to the country of La Fayette, and from the overwhelming interest excited by the first French Revolution. A little French had, before this time, been accepted in place of Greek, and a Frenchman had been a necessary "part and parcel" of the faculty. Of course, to torment him and amuse themselves with his transports of rage and his broken English was a regular part of the college fun. The trustees after some experience found that it was better to have French taught by a competent American, though with a little less of the Parisian accent, than to have to fight daily battles to redress the grievances of a persecuted Monsieur. Greek, after its introduction, became the bugbear of college. Having been absent when my class began it, I heard, on my return, such a terrific account of it, that I no more durst encounter the Greeks than Xerxes when he fled in consternation across the Hellespont after the battle of Salamis. Rather than lose my degree, however, after two years I plucked up courage and set doggedly and desperately to work, prepared hastily thirty Dialogues of Lucian, and on that stock of Greek was permitted to graduate. As for Chemistry and Differential and Integral Calculus and all that, we never heard of such hard things. They had not then crossed the Roanoke, nor did they appear among us till they were brought in by the Northern barbarians about the year 1818. Yet, notwithstanding the poor showing we could make as to faculty and course of study, the secretary of the board of that day was very ambitious of opening a sisterly correspondence and communion with all the colleges of the United States. He sent for all their Latin catalogues, and in order to be even with them, made up out of his own stock of Latin a catalogue for us, and diffused it through the land, from Maine to Georgia. Now this was a very unwise policy in that officer, for we were then in the very egg-shell of our existence, and ought to have concealed our nakedness from our mocking brethren of the North. This Latin pamphlet was in every respect a sorry looking affair. It was gotten up at Raleigh, on coarse paper, and it can be no offence now to say that Raleigh was not at that era a fortunate place of issue for a Latin pamphlet. But what was worse, it was disfigured with several sad blunders in the Latin—for I don't know that Latin is any part of the qualifications of a secretary of the board—and exhibited to the admiring world the following imposing Senatus Academicus: President Caldwell, who taught mathematics, natural and moral philosophy, and did all the preaching. Your humble servant was professor of languages, in general, I suppose; all, ancient and modern; and William D. Moseley (the future governor of Florida) was tutor. The professor of languages was of course responsible for this elegant and classical production, in which among other beauties, I recollect the treasurers of the board were called in conspicuous capitals TREASUR-ARII! I writhed under the mortification a long time, and was always afraid of meeting a professor from the North, lest he should ask me what was the Latin for treasurer.

The South Building, our neighbor over there, was then in an unfinished state, carried up a story and a half, and there left for many years to battle with the weather unsheltered; but still it was inhabited. "Inhabited!" you will say, "by what? By toads and snails and bats, I suppose." No sir, by students. Risum teneatis amici?

As the only dormitory that had a roof was too crowded for study, and as those who tried to study there spent half the evening in passing laws to regulate the other half, many students left their rooms as a place of study entirely, and built cabins in the corners of the unfinished brick walls, and quite comfortable cabins they were; but whence the plank came, out of which those cabins were built, your deponent saith not. Suffice it to hint that in such matters college boys are apt to adopt the code of Lycurgus: that there is no harm in privately transferring property, provided you are not caught at it. In such a cabin your speaker and dozens like him hibernated and burned their midnight oil. As soon as spring brought back the swallows and the leaves, we emerged from our dens and chose some shady retirement where we made a path and a promenade, and in that embowered promenade all diligent students of those days had to follow the steps of science, to wrestle with its difficulties, and to treasure up their best acquirements: Ye remnants of the Peripatetic school!

Ah! ye can tell how hard it is to climb

The steep where fame's proud temple shines afar!

They lived sub dio, like the birds that caroled over their heads. "But how," you will say, "did they manage in rainy weather?" Aye, that's the rub. Well, nothing was more common than, on a rainy day, to send in a petition to be excused from recitation, which petition ran in this stereotyped phrase: "The inclemency of the weather rendering it impossible to prepare the recitation, the Sophomore class respectfully request Mr. Rhea to excuse them from recitation this afternoon." To deliver this mission to the professor I was appointed envoy ordinary (not extraordinary) and plenipotentiary, being a little fellow hardly fifteen, and perhaps somewhat of a pet with the teacher. The professor, a good-natured, indolent man, after affecting some vexation (though he was secretly glad to get off himself), and pushing the end of his long nose this way and that way some half dozen times with his knuckles, concluded in a gruff voice with: "Well, get as much more for to-morrow." The shout of applause with which I was greeted upon reporting the success of my embassy resembled (if we may compare small things with great) the acclamations with which Mr. Webster was hailed by the Nation upon happily concluding the Ashburton treaty in 1842. by which war with Great Britain was prevented. Mr. Webster may have been greater but he was not prouder than I was at the successful issue of my negotiations. Who knows but what I might have been a first rate diplomat, if I had followed up these auspicious beginnings! And what do you think was the lesson from which a deliverance for one day was the occasion of such tumultuous joy? Why it was Morse's Geography, which was then the main Sophomore study, contained in two massive octavos, and to recite off which, like a speech, page by page, was the test and the glory of the first scholar of the class.

Dr. Morse was, with us, the great man of the age, and stood as high as does now his son, the inventor of the telegraph; and that notwithstanding he had stigmatized our State by mentioning under the head of "manners and customs of North Carolina," that a fashionable amusement of our people in their personal rencounters was, for the combatant who got his antagonist down to insert his thumb into the corner of his eye and twist out the ball; which elegant operation they called gouging. This slur upon national character would, nowa-days, have banished his book from our State. It excited so much the wrath of one of our representatives in Congress, William Barry Grove, of Fayetteville, that he declared if he ever met with Dr. Morse he would gouge him. He did meet with the doctor, who had heard of the threat, but instead of executing his purpose they had a hearty laugh over the story. Dr. Morse alleging that he had derived the account from Williamson.

And here, perhaps, it will not be offensive to introduce, among my reminiscences, the shadow of a reminiscence, which rests like a penumbra among the more distinct impressions on the tablet of my memory. It relates to a man who has long borne a conspicuous and honorable part among the editors of our country—one of the surviving Titans, who has planted his battery not five miles from the throne of Jove, and hurled many a thirty-two pounder at the White House and at the Capitol. Should this page chance to meet his eye, and should he recognize in it a faint nucleus of fact, he will laugh at a college legend which always hands down a much better story than it received. President Caldwell once caught some boys in mischief; among the rest he descried one on the top of the college, fastening a goose to the very ridge of the roof. "Ah! Joseph, Joseph," said he, "I suppose thou art fixing up that poor bird there as an emblem of thyself." Perhaps that severe cut from his teacher may have goaded the youthful truant to throw away the goose forever afterwards, reserving only a quill wherewith to write himself into renown. I hope he will forgive me for thus heralding his exploits upon the house-tops.

* * * * * *

While we are passing over certain early incidents of Dr. Caldwell's administration, before I leave the subject, the audience will no doubt indulge me in here introducing a brief notice of one of his most valued colleagues and coadjutors, the late lamented Dr. Mitchell. Here let us pause to drop a tear to the memory of this martyr of science. He fell a victim to too great self-reliance. This trait in his character, owing no doubt, in a considerable degree to constitutional temperament, was stimulated and confirmed by a New England education, in which youth are seldom indulged in that life of ease and indolence so common and so pernicious among ourselves; but are early thrown upon their own enterprise, and invention. and industry, for providing their future livelihood. This characteristic of that part of our country is remarkably calculated to develop all the latent energies within a youth, whether for good or for evil—a stern necessity "to do or die"—to swim or sink, which may produce a Franklin and a Webster, or peradventure a Benedict Arnold—like the fierce sun of the tropics, which concocts at once the aromatic gums and the deadly poisons.

This self-reliance of our regretted friend was conspicuous from his first appearance among us. It carried him, as a botanist, over almost every hill and meadow, and into every nook and corner of our extensive State, alone and through all weathers; and led him, as a geologist, to scale every mountain and penetrate every cavern, where Nature might promise spoils to philosophic curiosity. While youth remained, he escaped unharmed from the perils to which his adventurous spirit pushed him; but, like Milo, the famous athlete of Crotona, he forgot that he was growing old, and was lured to his death by too great confidence in that strength and activity on which he had so often relied with safety. At his age and with his high position as a savant, lie was entitled to an escort. He ought not to have been seen venturing alone and unassisted among precipitous cliffs, to make good North Carolina's claim to the Chimborazo of the Alleghanies. He ought to have had a retinue of enthusiastic pupils at his heels, magna comitante caterva, carrying his chain, his compass, his barometer, and his tent and traveling chest. And I have no doubt he might have enlisted such a corps of his pupils had he desired and requested it. But his self-reliance seemed to scorn all help, as a confession of incapacity and dependence. A bivouac in a mountain gorge, alone and far from the haunts of men, had something in it inviting to his bold and inquisitive genius. I think I have heard him say, that in one of his visits to the same mountainous region he had been drenched to the skin by a thunder-storm, and had lain down and slept in his wet clothes till the morning. That such a man should fall prematurely by his excessive spirit of adventure was naturally to have been apprehended, and we might have justly cautioned him in the language of Andromache:

Too daring man, ah! whither wouldst thou run, Ah! too forgetful of thy wife and son; For sure such courage length of life denies, And thou must fall, thy virtue's sacrifice.

I have such an opinion of my late friend's undaunted spirit of adventure, that I believe, if he had been one of the scientific corps who accompanied Napoleon in his expedition to Egypt, and if that general had summoned them all before him and said: "I want a man who will go to the biggest of the pyramids, find its secret entrance, explore, lamp in hand, its dark winding galleries, search its inmost penetralia, and bring out, if to be found, the sarcophagus of Cheops himself"—I believe that Elisha Mitchell would have stepped forth and said: "I'll try it." He would have been the very man to have joined Dr. Kane in his Arctic expedition. That daring navigator pushed his investigations to latitude eighty-two degrees, thirty minutes, the farthest hyperborean point ever reached by the foot of science, and laid down the coast to within less than eight degrees of the Pole. But if Mitchell had been along with him and Dr. Kane had detached him on an exploring trip, I should not have wondered if the Pole itself had been discovered, and Mitchell had tied his boat to the axis of the earth! Shade of my departed companion! forgive this sportive ebullition to which I have been tempted by the recollection of thine own jocose temper and playful spirit. How often, when I have gone to thee, gloomy and fretted by some transient irritation, has thy contagious hilarity and sunshiny face dispelled the cloud from my brow and the spleen from my temper, and I felt the truth of that inspired sentiment: "As iron sharpeneth iron, so does a man sharpen the countenance of his friends." Of such a man might be said, in the beautiful language of Dr. Johnson, that "his death has eclipsed the gaiety of his country and impoverished the general stock of harmless pleasure," as well as of valuable science.

But, brothers of the alumni, I could not excuse myself, and I should but ill perform the duty committed to me this day, if I devoted the whole of this address to amusing or mournful reminiscences of the past. I wish to say something, before I sit down, which will be profitable for the future. It may be allowable on a joyous anniversary like the present, to entertain ourselves and our audience with some pictures of college life half a century ago. But it becomes us as educated men, who have gone through the perils and who have reaped the fruits of a collegiate career, to direct our thoughts to the great question how these perils may be encountered and these advantages secured with the least admixture of evil. As lovers of our common country—as North Carolinians, ambitious of the honor of our State—as men bound to feel for those many parents who trust to these walls their dearest treasure—their sons, that are to bless or to blast their homesteads we ought to make it a subject of anxious thought, how to prevent a great college from being a great calamity. As men of reflection and humanity, we must have been often saddened by observing the vast amount of waste in human life, human talent, and human happiness, which the spectacle of our colleges presents. That there is a strong tendency, when large numbers of young men are congregated together and live to themselves with very little intermixture with general society, to become dissipated, riotous, and lawless, the history of all colleges proves, both in this country and in Europe. The two universities of England have been long famous as the abodes of licentiousness of all kinds. Mr. Griscom, one of the most respectable and intelligent citizens of New York, visited Oxford about forty years ago, and after witnessing a disgraceful scene enacted by a party of students at the hotel, makes the following reflections: "Alas! for such an education as this. What can Latin and Greek and all the store of learning and science have to make amends in an hour of retribution, for a depraved heart and an understanding debased by such vicious indulgence? I cannot but cherish the hope that this incident does not furnish a fair specimen of the morals of the students. It will doubtless happen, that in so large a number as that here collected, in the various colleges, many will bring with them habits extremely unfavorable to morality and subordination. But from the information derived from my guide, who was a moderate man, and certainly well informed with respect to the habits of the place, and from the observations which forced themselves upon me in my walks through the streets and gardens, this evening, I am obliged to deduce the lamentable conclusion that the morals of the nation are not much benefited by the direct influence of this splendid seat of learning." And although he inclines to the opinion that the state of morals is not quite so bad at Cambridge, yet he admits it to be a doubtful question, and that this is only a surmise of his own, and says: "It would be a curious and interesting subject of inquiry to ascertain, with as much accuracy as possible, the comparative morality of Oxford and Cambridge, as it is admitted that in Oxford the collegiate studies are directed with paramount assiduity to moral philosophy and the higher range of classical learning, while in Cambridge mathematics and natural philosophy have a transcendent influence."

What license, what scorn, what blasphemy, what atheism, must the rowdies at Cambridge feel at liberty to indulge in, when they see the disbanded debauchés of the camp suddenly turned into pastors, having the care of souls!

This testimony relates to the state of things at those celebrated universities forty years ago. Have things improved since that date? Let us hear the testimony of Sydney Smith, one of the most distinguished literati of the present century, whom none will suspect of too austere and puritanical a view of the subject. In a letter written but a few years ago, to one of his female correspondents, he says: "I feel for Mrs. ——about her son at Oxford, knowing as I do, that the only consequences of a university education are the growth of vice and the waste of money."

In the German universities, so far as reports have been published among us, the state of morals is even worse, the frequent practice of dueling being added to the usual vices of college life.

The college of which we boast ourselves to be sons was founded in an era most dark and inauspicious to religionthe close of the last and the beginning of the present century. Our country had just emerged from a long, distressing war, and it is well known that war has a hardening effect upon the minds of men, familiarizing them with blood and death, and rendering them skeptical and indifferent in matters relating to a future world. To this add the overshadowing influence of France. The splendor of her philosophers and political economists had then attracted the admiration of the world; her powerful fellowship in arms had helped us happily through our struggle for liberty, and then her imitation of us in bursting her own shackles—all these ties had bound us to her destinies with an enthusiasm and self-sacrifice which had well-nigh engulfed us in the same devouring whirlpool that finally swallowed up her first Republic. She reciprocated all our enthusiasm and received our Franklin in Paris with the honors of a demigod, condensing into one pregnant Latin hexameter his two greatest exploits—the snatching of lightning from heaven and the sceptre from tyrants:

"Eripuit calo fulmen, sceptrumque tyrannis."

Unhappily when France overturned the throne and the Bastile, she overturned, with the same convulsive throes, the temple of God, and set up as her only object of worship the goddess Liberty—liberty not only from the chains of despots, but from all belief in future responsibility. This portentous atheism spread its disastrous influence over most of our public men, and hence the works of Voltaire and his royal patron, Frederick of Prussia, of Rousseau, Helvetius, Bolingbroke, Hume, Gibbon, and Paine, were found in the libraries of our principal families, however small these libraries were. Some of these, presented by trustees and others, were among the most conspicuous books in our University and society libraries in their early beginnings. As the cock was the national emblem of France, it is hardly vulgar to quote here our homely proverb: "As the old cock crows the young one learns." Our first professors and students caught the Gallic infection; and Dr. Caldwell, among his early difficulties, had to struggle with infidelity in the faculty and infidelity among the students; and hence, among his sermons of that date, many will be found in refutation of objections against Christianity. The same difficulties Dr. Dwight was contending with at Yale College, to the presidency of which he was called a few years before this date. From the commencement of Dr. Caldwell's administration the Christian religion has been recognized and taught in this institution, and its laws have required the students to attend such religious services as they were called to by the professors. Since that time the growth of the several ecclesiastical bodies has made it right and important to consult their wishes by representation in the academic corps; and it would seem that the best practicable plan has been fallen on to allay sectarian jealousy, and to give Christianity such prominence in our collegiate system as to impress our undergraduates with the conviction that it is venerated as of divine origin and as the religion of our country.

But after all this public provision for the maintenance of religious influence and of moral habits, it is a lamentable fact that colleges will nourish within their bosoms a large amount of vicious dissipation, idleness, and profusion. The two great obstacles to government and incentives to disorder are the congregation of large numbers of youth into houses by themselves and the use of intoxicating drinks. Whether we have not made a mistake in thus isolating the students from family society, and crowding them together in such numbers under one roof, may admit of painful doubt. Judge O'Neall gives it as his decided conviction that dormitories ought to be done away with, and the students distributed among respectable families. Dr. James W. Alexander, of New York, one of the first men of this country, an alumnus of Princeton, and for a long time a professor there, in a letter received from him a few years since, says: "Of all absurd things in the world, one of the most absurd is to put a great number of boys together in a large building, to keep house by themselves." This is the first difficulty; but whether the plan proposed as a remedy would succeed better has not, I believe, been put to the test. We cannot, therefore, say of the recipe: probatum est. The other difficulty, the use of intoxicating liquors, is the gigantic evil of colleges, and leads all reflecting persons, as well as Mr. Griscom, sometimes to doubt whether all the benefits of public education are not outweighed by this enormous mischief to the morals and happiness of our families. War is, while it lasts, perhaps the most terrific calamity with which our race is scourged. Pestilence too, now and then, poisons the common element we all do breathe, and more than decimates our cities. These evils, however, are intermittent; they leave long intervals of repose and healthful enjoyment. But intemperance, begun in youth and often continued and aggravated through tedious years of shame and sorrow, in so many families—this, this, is the running ulcer of our social body; this is the perennial, fetid, Stygian flood that is circling round and round the land and pouring its poisonous tide into our sacred homes. This it is which causes more human hearts to ache and more human faces to blush than any other cause. In vain have been all your temperance societies. In vain your temperance lecturers have been sent through the length of the land —gifted with tragic powers to make the public weep over the horrors of drunkenness, and with comic powers to make the drunkard the laughing-stock of the world. In vain have been all these schemes to abate the nuisance. Intemperance has grown under all these appliances, like the cancer spreading under the surgeon's knife, or the Hydra multiplying its heads under the club of Hercules.

> Alas! Leviathan is not thus tamed; Laughed at, he laughs again, and stricken hard, Turns to the stroke his adamantine scales, That fear no discipline from human hands.

And if this disease is so pernicious in its sporadic form. turning a home here and a home there into a habitation of wretchedness, what must it be when concentrated in a public institution, a multitude countenancing and stimulating each other, "despising the shame," and by their united strength breaking down every barrier! A college thus tainted is like our great Western river, with all its swollen affluents, bursting all the embankments and carrying terror and devastation and malaria over the fruitful valley which it ought to adorn and fertilize. For this single vice is at the root of all collegiate disturbances and delinquencies. Of every drinking student may be said what was said of Judas Iscariot: "With the sob Satan entered into him." Hence all the counsels of educators. all the ingenuity of physicians, all the discoveries of chemistry, all the wisdom and power of legislative bodies, should be put in requisition to contend with this portentous mischief. And he who shall discover a cure or even an alleviation of this curse of humanity will deserve a monument higher and more enduring than the pyramids, and be entitled to a gratitude deeper and wider than that accorded to Dr. Jenner, who has relieved the world of the terrors of smallpox. Premiums are offered for all improvements in the industrial and economical arts, and for the best essays on all moral subjects; but the richest premium will he deserve, who, by some chymic art, shall make young collegians loathe intoxicating drinks, or by some happy improvement in political economy, shall drive ardent spirits out of the land as an article of manufacture or of commerce. The might of man has failed; may we not appeal to the softer but more potent influence of woman? Will not the ladies, themselves safe and superior to this infirmity, come to the rescue of our powerless sex? We are called the stronger sex and they the weaker; but as to temptations to vice, they are the stronger and we the weaker sex. I have the same opinion of them that Lord Chatham had of the English soldiers: "They can achieve anything but impossibilities." They are not good at making large bargains, I admit, as is proved by the price they have agreed to give for Mt. Vernon; but even there the bargain is to their credit, showing that they estimate the "value received," not in the worth of the land, but in the testimony of national gratitude and in sending an ambassador around the land to teach, in honeyed accents, the grandest lesson this family of nations can learn, namely: by loving their common father, to love and cherish the united republic which he lived and labored and suffered to establish. Let those who have entered with so much zeal into this national "labor of love" now join their hearts in another, touching more nearly the happiness of their country and of the world. Let them proclaim with their sovereign voice, from one end of the continent to the other, that their smiles and their hands are the prize of sobriety alone. From all their lips let there be heard the general chorus:

Young men, young men who love your drink, Your bark of hope and bliss must sink; We'll never trust with you our life— You cannot, shall not have a wife.

* * * * * *

After so long an address, can I, ought I to be insensible to the flattering attention and marks of approbation with which it has been received? I well know what has worked so mightily in my favor. Never was speaker more fortunate in the temper of the house. Among the charms which, according to old Homer, Jove conferred upon his darling daughter, Venus, was that of philonimeides; she was the queen of smiles, the laughter-loving Aphrodite. So the presence of the Chief Magistrate of the Union has made every one joyous—it has given me a laughter-loving audience, and among them many a Venus, with lambent lightnings playing about her eyes, encircled with the irresistible Cestus, and with the little rogue Cupid sitting at her feet, ever sharpening his burning arrows on a bloody whetstone. And if I owe an apology to my kind and indulgent audience for the parti-colored character of this address, this motley mixture of the serious and the ludicrous, here is my defence: Such is life, in which shade and sunshine chase each other over the plain-in which joy and sorrow rapidly alternate in our hearts—in which smiles often shine through our tears and dry them up-and again tears start forth and extinguish the light of our smiles. Such is life, and such did Shakespeare, the greatest painter of life, represent it. His pictures of man are neither unmixed tragedies nor unmixed comedies, but tragi-comedies. Such alternations seem to be our Creator's design.

The lights and shades, whose well-accorded strife, Give all the strength and color of our life.

Sorrow in advance makes the arrival of gladness more glad, and sorrow apprehended in the future chastises and tempers the transports of present pleasure, and mingles all our rejoicings with salutary trembling.

Alas! by some degree of wo,
We ever bliss must gain;
The heart can ne'er a transport know,
That never knew a pain.

And yet something whispers me that the retrospect I have taken ought to have inspired a more serious strain. Of the long line of alumni with whom I have been contemporary, how few survive!

"Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto."

Of seven eminent men with whom I have had the honor to coöperate as professor in this institution, six now have passed off the stage of action. Caldwell, Hentz, Mitchell, Andrews, Anderson, and Olmsted are no more. Their accents which once contributed to enlighten and adorn our State are now hushed in the voiceless grave, and perhaps ere another anniversary revolves around and brings you together again, the two who yet remain will be gathered with those who have gone before them. To one who looks back fifty or sixty years, what a shadow is man! how fleeting, how trifling do seem all his interests and schemes, his hopes and his fears! The thought extorted a sigh even from a pagan moralist:

O! curas hominum! O! quantum est in rebus inane.

How fading the honors of earth, how empty the applause of men! But happy, thrice happy we, that this fading pageant is not all—that our deathless souls, never satisfied with the limited and transient, and always reaching after something illimitable and infinite, shall, if purified by religion, enter upon a state where all our companions and joy shall be perfect and unchangeable:

Where Time, and Pain, and Chance, and Death expire; Where momentary ages are no more; Where seraphs gather immortality, On Life's fair tree, fast by the throne of God.

JAMES BARRON HOPE

[1829-1887]

MORRIS P. TILLEY

THE poets of the South of a generation ago are those nightingales of legend that sang their songs under the sharp pricks of thorns buried in their breasts. While enduring their keenest pangs of suffering, they were filling the air with sweetest music. Their sensitive souls were rent and torn by the crushing blows of war which fell upon the South with stunning effect, adding keen anguish and bitter suffering to the burden of poverty and disease which they, in common with their fellow sufferers, bore home from the struggles of arms.

"Virginia's laureate," James Barron Hope, had already gained fame as a poet, before the secession of Virginia had hurried him to the front, to follow, for four years, the varying fortunes of the Civil War, and finally, after the surrender of Johnston in South Carolina, to return to find his home in ashes. Upon two notable occasions before the opening of the conflict, he had been chosen to acclaim in verse the fame and renown of his mother State; and had responded in the "Jamestown Ode," commemorating the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the English colony on the James, and in the "Washington Memorial Ode," delivered at the unveiling, in 1858, of the Washington monument at Richmond. In each of these efforts the heart of the writer had been revealed as the worshipper of the history and tradition of Virginia; on each occasion, too, the martial blood of his ancestors had been aroused in the contemplation of the proud record of the mother Commonwealth, and had poured out its tribute to the deeds worthy of song that are scattered on every page of the history of his State. There was in these odes, moreover, the same spirit of devotion and loyalty to Virginia that was to make him, in many a subsequent ode and memorial address, the Confederate soldier's poet. There was, too, the same spirit of elation in martial themes, which had struck off, in 1857, in an hour of inspiration, "The Charge of Balaklava," a poem filled with the wild rush of battle and the agony and victory of death.

This poet of the late fifties, tall, slender, and graceful, with a pale face and deep-set eyes, was a Virginian descended of Virginians, who, in the hour of the birth of our nation, had given to their sons, for a future day of struggle, an example of burning patriotism in the defense of their homes. As a small boy wandering in play about the grounds of the Gosport navy yard, where his grandfather at that time was in command, and where in 1820 he had been born, our poet felt early and naturally the love of his State and the pride of defending her rights. His environment in some degree, but in far greater degree his blood, was already teaching him his duty to his country, a duty to be transferred later to his State. On his mother's side he was hearing how his Barron forefathers had been admirals, first of the Virginia Colonial navy, and later of the navy of the United States; until, in his time, the names of Barron had come, in the minds of Virginians, to be thought of and associated with the command of the seas. From his father, on the other hand, he was hearing of another sturdy and no less daring set of patriots, who, on the banks of the Hampton River, had launched vessels of war, to fly the flag of open defiance to the power of Great Britain.

The days of listening to the stories of the past gave place, in a few years, to those of active exertion of the present, and the growing boy found interest in exploring, across the river, the neighboring town of Norfolk; and less frequently, in tramping over the broad acres of the Hope estate, on the Hampton River, School days followed; first at Germantown, Pennsylvania, where he was near one of his uncle admirals who was stationed at Philadelphia; and afterwards at the "Academy" at Hampton, Virginia, where he came under the instruction and influence of that master of pedagogy, John B. Cary. Here under the stimulating influence of a teacher who needed neither rule nor regulation by which to govern, nor yet book nor chart by which to instruct, the boy ripened and developed into the young man, whose enthusiastic nature was to strike sparks on the flint of his master's ardent mind, revealing in unexpected degree the seriousness and the depth of his character, and developing at the same time those strong affections which were to win and to hold, until the end, the master's love and esteem. At home and at school, then, this boy, who was one day to receive the proud name of "Virginia's laureate," was moulding his character. Ardent, loyal, sympathetic, his nature was free from either envy or hate. The light of personality, while still a boy, had begun to shine, though fitfully as yet; but, in years to come, the developed devotion and loyalty of home and school, conjoined to a Southern sense of honor and chivalry, gave him that charm and force of character that made him a steady light to those who knew him.

The swiftly passing years of the forties and fifties, with their ominous and deepening warnings of the impending strife, found James Barron Hope growing up in Tidewater, Virginia, studying at the Virginia College of William and Mary, fighting a duel with pistols on the field of honor of the city of his school days, and, after recovering from the wound received in this affair, cruising in a United States frigate, as the secretary of his uncle, Admiral Samuel Barron. With advancing years of maturity, at the age of twenty-seven, he turned to the profession of law, and settled at Hampton, Virginia, to follow the road that had opened to successive generations of Virginians opportunities for conspicuous service to both State and Nation.

However, before he was to be able to give all of his interest to the winning of legal fame, love and poetry in alliance were to claim his attention in the suit his heart was paying to its mistress. His reputation as a poet was growing with his contributions to the Southern Literary Messenger; as was his favor in the eves of the lady of Hampton, in whom he found the inspiration for his poetry. In 1857 he won his suit; and married Miss Annie Beverly Whiting, who had taken captive, by the beauty of her character and face, his poet's fancy. The year before he had been elected commonwealth's attorney for Hampton, so that now he was well launched toward a life which, had the destiny of events not intervened, would have made him one of those leisurely, yet able practitioners of the Southern courts, with ample time to devote to his love of poetry, to the society of his friends, and to the development of his estate-the life, in short, which has left us those examples, now growing rare, of the courtly, courteous gentleman of the South, who, removed from the necessity of earning a living and possessed of the culture of birth, had both the time and the opportunity to make, of the cultivation of the charm and graces of a gentleman, a profession in itself.

In those four years of the clash of arms, the poet Hope became for the time the soldier Hope; but when once more, in later years, the desire to sing grew strong within him, while yet the memories of those days of sacrifice and failure were still fresh in mind, he turned to poetry to express his teeming thoughts, that were now of honor to the dead, and now of courage to the living. His song was from now on of war, and of the Southern men of war. As the poet of Virginia, the State where the conflict had waged the fiercest, and where the loss of life and limb had been the greatest, he was, of the Southern poets of his time, the one who carried from the war to his poetry the keenest clarion of battle. The martial vein in his nature responded in sympathy to the appeal of the Lost Cause; and in his subsequent efforts, he poured forth, in homage to the dead, memorial ode after memorial ode, until in his supreme achievement, his ode in honor of his "Great Captain," he has left us a poem of unusual power and strength.

After the shattering of his dreams, James Barron Hope, with those other busy, ardent workmen-poets of the South, who had wagered and lost all, settled down courageously to solve the problem of peace. Wealth and opportunity to practice his profession had vanished; and more, when he returned from the soldier life, he found himself afflicted with the physical agony that he was to suffer heroically for many years. With his fellow sufferers, however, he took at once his place with the active toilers of the day, and, turning his back upon the thirty years of life spent in the charming social circle of old Hampton, he gave up the practice of law, for which he had fitted himself, and plunged into the active arena of journalism in Norfolk, Virginia.

In this city he settled down to win a livelihood with his pen, and he succeeded. As the founder and editor of the Norfolk Landmark, by his ability and his fearlessness, he made the paper an influence of power in the State. The scholarly traditions that he created in the office of the Landmark, and that have been continued by subsequent editors of that office, gave to the paper the distinction which came of having at its head a man who could not only feel and think deeply, but who had at his command, because of talent and practice, the power to express fully his thoughts and feelings. Besides his newspaper work, he was interested in the welfare of the public schools of Norfolk; and with much the same spirit of service with which General Lee had taken upon himself the duties of the presidency of Washington and Lee University, he assumed the responsibilities of the Superintendent of the Norfolk schools.

In these busy years the greater part of his time was spent between the duties of the editorial office and those of the Superintendent of Schools; but in the hours that he could spare for himself, he was preparing memorial addresses for meetings of different camps of Confederate veterans, and now and then, turning his mind back to the days of battle, was putting into verse scenes that he had witnessed on the march or in the camp, or as in "Under One Blanket," on the field of battle, after the fighters had withdrawn and left the field to the cold bodies of the soldiers who had paid for their devotion with their lives.

Early in his career as a poet, when twenty-eight years of age, Hope had written in "The Charge of Balaklava" a kind of poetry that was to be characteristic of many of his later efforts. Written in a stirring martial measure, and breathing the tumult and disorder of the battlefield, this poem forms an accurate measure of the poet who is, in later days, to champion in other stirring martial measures, with far greater feeling, a conflict of vaster proportions and of more spectacular dashes than the charge of Balaklava, which engages his interest in this poem.

This poem on a martial subject, which had called forth the warmth, even the fire of his nature, was but a preparation for other and deeper felt expressions of his admiration of bravery on the battlefield, the inspiration for which he found at home. It required, at most, only the projection of the poetic imagination into the experiences of the Southern soldier to make them glow with feeling; so that the poet had only to pour into the moulds of poetic form the stream of his own experiences, to move us deeply by his descriptions of the pathetic scenes and the tragic happenings of the war. With "Mahone's Brigade" and with the "Cadets of New Market," to mention two of his war subjects, he lifts the curtain on the bullet-swept battlefields, with their victories, and their defeats; their charges, their surprises, their losses, their glories; the hours of pain and the minutes of death; the rally round the flag; the wild rush to capture the enemy's battery, the rebel yell answered by the scream of the wounded, the quick glint of the bayonet, the rattle of musketry and the roar of the cannon; and the smoke hanging low over the whole bloody field. He gives us another and a sadder picture in the "Memorial Odes." The days of battle are passed now; and it is the result of those battles that we are confronting.

In Hope's later poems, added to this suffusion of the martial spirit in various degrees, we find a matured devotion and a riper wisdom that enabled him, in singing of the war, "to rise up," without the clogging impediments of bitterness and hate, "and conquer fate." He accepted as the inevitable the outcome of the war; and in his poetry, while abating no jot or tittle of his conviction that he had fought a righteous fight, and glorying in the fame the Southern soldiers had rightly won, he saw the uselessness of keeping alive the smouldering fires of sectional discord. In consequence he took frequent occasion to impress upon his readers that the rupture of the past was closed, and that our country stood united in new strength. In his "metrical address" delivered in 1881 on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown, he gave no uncertain answer on this subject. In other poems he makes further proclamation of this truce to hostile feeling between the South and the North. At the end of that masterly ode in memory of Lee, he finds in the example of his chief, the lesson "to bow reverently to God," and to recognize that His will, not theirs, was done. It was a natural expression of his best wisdom to counsel his fellow citizens to turn their backs on the bitterness of the past, and to live in a future enriched by a heritage of valor and of glory, not surpassed in the annals of time. In "Our Heroic Dead," where in every line is the tender love he bore the Southern heroes that fell, he passes the bounds of sectional admiration and holds up with confidence to the entire country the heroic deeds of soldiers that had worn the gray.

In these poems that the war brought forth is the warrior poet; daring, devoted, red-blooded; quick to resent an insult, and equally quick to shield a fallen foe. But in other poems there is the poet of a gentler hour, the poet of friendship, who, in the record of his personal sympathies, touches chords of a sweetness unheard in the bolder music of his martial poems.

The appeal of Hope's verse is not to the reader of a highly developed musical sense, for his verse is of the conventional, unmusical rhymed character of Pope's day. Nor is there in his poetry the quality of imagination that would raise him to the rank of the great poets.

Hope's poetry was provincial; his interests did not include subjects farther abroad than the boundaries of his own State. In its kind, too, it is to be narrowed to occasional poetry, for it is by his odes written for stated occasions that he is best known. These odes have suffered, as do all occasional poems, in the passing of interest in the events they celebrate; but they were fortunate in the subjects that gave them birth. The older history of Virginia and the more recent history of the Civil War elicited from his hero-worshipping nature both the unusual fervor and the sympathy that have given his poems value for a later day. As the poet of Virginia, at a time when the people of this State were passing through the throes of the Reconstruction Period, he has preserved in his verse the trials and the hopes of his fellow citizens. In simple, direct expression he has left us in these sincere reflections of his feelings, significant record of an important era in the history of Virginia.

There is no dark despair in the character of Hope; he found the good in men and life, and reflected it in his work. His war poems, first and foremost, show us the courage he gave his people to struggle on, courage for new and stronger efforts after the old had failed. This characteristic attitude of eager helpfulness marks other than his war poems. His poetic art was never an instrument to offer to the world the doubts and the difficulties of his soul, to put into beautiful form the misgivings of his heart. It had a higher purpose. It rather cheered the drooping spirits of his people when they needed most to be cheered; or honored in terms of praise or endearment, the genius of strong men of Virginia, like Ryan, the poet, and Galt, the sculptor; or again, by pointing back to the records of the past in war, in art, in poetry, it prepared the way for greater achievements of the future. Hope and faith, courage and confidence, and these virtues working within the limitations of his poetic gift for the greater benefit of his State, give us the essential spirit of Hope's poetry.

THE CHARGE AT BALAKLAVA

All selections are from "A Wreath of Virginia Bay Leaves." Copyright 1895.
Printed here by kind permission of Mrs. Janey Hope Marr.

Nolan halted where the squadrons Stood impatient of delay, Out he drew his brief dispatches, Which their leader quickly snatches, At a glance their meaning catches: They are ordered to the fray!

All that morning they had waited—
As their frowning faces showed,
Horses stamping, riders fretting,
And their teeth together setting;
Not a single sword-blade wetting
As the battle ebbed and flowed.

Now the fevered spell is broken,
Every man feels twice as large,
Every heart is fiercely leaping,
As a lion roused from sleeping,
For they know they will be sweeping
In a moment to the charge.

Brightly gleam six hundred sabres,
And the brazen trumpets ring;
Steeds are gathered, spurs are driven,
And the heavens widely riven
With a mad shout upward given,
Scaring vultures on the wing.

Stern its meaning; was not Gallia Looking down on Albion's sons? In each mind this thought implanted, Undismayed and all undaunted, By the battle-fields enchanted, They ride down upon the guns.

Onward! On! the chargers trample; Quicker falls each iron heel! And the headlong pace grows faster; Noble steed and noble master, Rushing on to red disaster, Where the heavy cannons peal.

In the van rides Captain Nolan; Soldier stout he was and brave! And his shining sabre flashes, As upon the foe he dashes: God! his face turns white as ashes, He has ridden to his grave!

Down he fell, prone from his saddle,
Without motion, without breath.
Never more a trump to waken—
He the very first one taken,
From the bough so sorely shaken,
In the vintage-time of Death.

In a moment, in a twinkling,

He was gathered to his rest;
In the time for which he'd waited—
With his gallant heart elated—
Down went Nolan, decorated

With a death wound on his breast.

Comrades still are onward charging,
He is lying on the sod:
Onward still their steeds are rushing
Where the shot and shell are crushing;
From his corpse the blood is gushing,
And his soul is with his God.

As they spur on, what strange visions
Flit across each rider's brain!
Thoughts of maidens fair, of mothers,
Friends and sisters, wives and brothers,
Blent with images of others,
Whom they ne'er shall see again.

Onward still the squadrons thunder— Knightly hearts were theirs and brave, Men and horses without number All the furrowed ground encumber— Falling fast to their last slumber— Bloody slumber! bloody grave!

Of that charge at Balaklava— In its chivalry sublime— Vivid, grand, historic pages Shall descend to future ages; Poets, painters, hoary sages Shall record it for all time.

Telling how those English horsemen Rode the Russian gunners down; How with ranks all torn and shattered; How with helmets hacked and battered; How with sword arms blood-bespattered; They won honor and renown.

'Twas "not war," but it was splendid As a dream of old romance; Thinking which their Gallic neighbors Thrilled to watch them at their labors, Hewing red graves with their sabres, In that wonderful advance.

Down went many a gallant soldier;
Down went many a stout dragoon;
Lying grim, and stark, and gory,
On the crimson field of glory,
Leaving us a noble story
And their white-cliffed home a boon.

Full of hopes and aspirations
Were their hearts at dawn of day;
Now, with forms all rent and broken,
Bearing each some frightful token
Of a scene ne'er to be spoken,
In their silent sleep they lay.

Here a noble charger stiffens,
There his rider grasps the hilt
Of his sabre lying bloody
By his side, upon the muddy,
Trampled ground, which darkly ruddy
Shows the blood that he has spilt.

And to-night the moon shall shudder
As she looks down on the moor,
Where the dead of hostile races
Slumber, slaughtered in their places;
All their rigid ghastly faces
Spattered hideously with gore.

And the sleepers! ah, the sleepers
Make a Westminster that day;
'Mid the seething battle's lava!
And each man who fell shall have a Proud inscription—BALAKLAVA,
Which shall never fade away.

SELECTIONS FROM "WASHINGTON MEMORIAL ODE"

Oh, proud old Commonwealth! thy sacred name Makes frequent music on the lips of Fame! And as the nation, in its onward march, Thunders beneath the Union's mighty arch, Thine the bold front which every patriot sees The stateliest figure on its massive frieze. Oh, proud old State! well may thy form be grand, 'Twas thine to give a Savior to the land.

For, in the past, when upward rose the cry, "Save or we perish!" thine 'twas to supply The master-spirit of the storm whose will Said to the billows in their wrath: "Be still!" And though a great calm followed, yet the age In which he saw that mad tornado rage Made in its cares and wild tempestuous strife One solemn passion of his noble life.

* * * * * *

When the fierce torrent—lava-like—of bronze To mould this statue burst its furnace bonds, When it out-thundered in its liquid flow, With splendid flame and scintillating glow, 'Twas in its wild tumultuous throb and storm Type of the age which moulded into form The God-like character of him sublime. Whose name is reared a statue for all time In the great minister of the whole world's heart, I've called his name a statue. Stern and vast It rests enthroned upon the mighty past: Fit plinth for him whose image in the mind Looms up as that of one by God designed! Fit plinth and sooth! the mighty past for him Whose simple name is Glory's synonym! E'en Fancy's self, in her enchanted sleep, Can dream no future which may cease to keep His name in guard, like sentinel and cry, From Time's great bastions: "It shall never die."

And here remember that your best applause

And here remember that your best applause To him is shown in standing by the Laws! But if our rights shall ever be denied, I call upon you by your race's pride, To seek some "West Augusta" and unfurl Our banner where the mountain vapors curl: Lowland and valley then will swell the cry, He left us free: thus will we live or die! One other word, Virginia, hear thy son, Whose filial service now is nearly done—

Hear me old State! thou art supremely blest:
A hero's ashes slumber in thy breast!
Oh, Mother! if the ashes of a king
Could nerve to deeds with which Fame's trumpets ring.
What glove of challenger shall make thee start,
When thy great son lies sleeping on thy heart!

DREAMERS

Fools laugh at dreamers, and the dreamers smile In answer, if they any answer make:
They know that Saxon Alfred could not bake
The oaten cakes, but that he snatched his Isle Back from the fierce and bloody-handed Dane.

And so, they leave the plodders to their gains—Quit money changing for the student's lamp, And tune the harp to gain thereby some camp, Where what they learn is worth a kingdom's crown; They fashion bows and arrows to bring down The mighty truths which sail the upper air; To them the facts which make the fools despair Become familiar, and a thousand things Tell them the secrets they refuse to kings.

Oft when pacing thro' the long and dim Dark gallery of the past, I pause before A picture of which this is a copy— Wretched at best.

How fair she look'd, standing a tip-toe there, Pois'd daintily upon her little feet! The slanting sunset falling thro' the leaves In golden glory on her smiling face, Upturn'd toward the blushing roses; while The breeze that came up from the river's brink, Shook all their clusters over her fair face; And sported with her robe, until me thought,

That she stood there clad wondrously indeed! In perfume and in music; for her dress Made a low rippling sound like little waves That break at midnight on the tawny sands—While all the evening air of roses whisper'd. Over her face a rich, warm blush spread slowly, And she laughed a low, sweet, mellow laugh To see the branches still evade her hands—Her small white hands which seem'd indeed as if Made only thus to gather roses.

Then with face
All flushed and smiling she did nod to me
Asking my help to gather them for her:
And so, I bent the heavy clusters down,
Show'ring the rose-leaves o'er her neck and face;
Then carefully she plucked the very fairest one,
And court'seying playfully gave it to me—
Show'd me her finger-tip, pricked by a thorn,
And when I would have kissed it, shook her head,
Kiss'd it herself, and mocked me with a smile!
The rose she gave me sleeps between the leaves
Of an old poet where its sight oft brings
That Summer evening back again to me.

TO ALEXANDER GALT, THE SCULPTOR

Alas! he's cold!

Cold as the marble which his fingers wrought—Cold, but not dead; for each embodied thought Of his, which he from the Ideal brought

To live in stone, Assures him immortality of fame.

Galt is not dead!
Only too soon
We saw him climb
Up to his pedestal, where equal Time
And coming generations, in the noon
Of his full reputation, yet shall stand
To pay just homage to his noble name.

Our Poet of the Quarries only sleeps, He cleft his pathway up the future's steeps, And now rests from his labors.

Hence 'tis I say;
For him there is no death,
Only the stopping of the pulse and breath—
But simple breath is not the all in all;
Man hath it but in common with the brutes—
Life is in action and in brave pursuits!
By what we dream, and having dreamt, dare do,
We hold our places in the world's large view,
And still have part in the affairs of men
When the long sleep is on us.

He dreamt and made his dreams perpetual things Fit for the rugged cell of penitential saints,

Or sumptuous halls of Kings,
And showed himself a Poet in the Art;
He chiselled Lyrics with a touch so fine,
With such a tender beauty of their own,
That rarest songs broke out from every line
And verse was audible in voiceless stone!
His Psyche, soft in beauty and in grace,
Waits for her lover in the Western breeze,
And a swift smile irradiates her face,
As though she heard him whisper in the trees.

His passion-stricken Sappho seems alive—Before her none can ever feel alone, For on her face emotions so do strive That we forget she is but pallid stone; And all her tragedy of love and woe Is told us in the chilly marble's snow.

Bacchante, with her vine-crowned hair, Leaps to the cymbal measured dance With such a passion in her air—Upon her brow—upon her lips—As thrills you to the finger-tips, And fascinates your glance.

These are, as 'twere, three of his songs in Stone—The first full of the tenderness of love,
Speaking of moon-rise, and the low wind's call:
The second of love's tragedy and fall;
The third of shrill, mad laughter, and the tone
Of festal music, on whose rise and fall
Swift-footed dancers follow.

Nobler than these sweet lyric dreams,
Dreamt out beside Italia's streams,
He'd worked some Epic studies out, in part—
To leave them incomplete his chiefest pain
When the low pulses of his failing heart
Admonished him of death.

Ay! he had soared upon a lofty wing, Wet with the purple and encrimsoned rain Of dreams, whose clouds had floated o'er his brain Until it ached with glories.

If you would see his Epic studies, go—
Go with the student from his dim arcade—
Halt where the Statesman standeth in the hall,
And mark how careless voices hush and fall,
And all light talk to sudden pause is brought
In presence of the noble type of thought—
Embodied Independence which he wrought
From stone of far Carrara.

View his Columbus: Hero grand and meek, Scarred 'mid the battle's long-protracted brunt— Palos and Salvador stamped on his front, With not a line about it, poor or weak— A second Atlas, bearing on his brow A New World, just discovered.

Go see Virginia's wise, majestic face With some faint shadow of her coming woe Writ on the broad, expansive, virgin snow Of her imperial forehead, just as though Some disembodied Prophet-hand of eld The Sculptor's chisel in its touch had held, Foreshadowing her coming crown of thorns—Her crown and her great glory!
These of the many; but they are enough—Enough to show that I have rightly said
The marble's snow bids back from him decay,
He sleepeth long; but sleeps not with the dead
Who die, and are forgotten ere the clay
Heaped over them hath hardened in the sun.

This much of Galt, the Artist:

Of the man

Fain would I speak, but in sad sooth I can Ne'er find the words wherein to tell How he was loved, or yet how well

He did deserve it.

All things of beauty were to him delight— The sunset's clouds—the turret rent apart— The stars which glitter in the noon of night— Spoke in one voice unto his mind and heart, His love of Nature made his love of Art,

> And had his span Of life been longer

He had surely done
Such noble things that he Like to a soaring eagle would have been
At last—lost in the sun!

UNDER ONE BLANKET

The sun went down in flame and smoke,
The cold night passed without alarms,
And when the bitter morning broke
Our men stood to their arms,

But not a foe in front was found After the long and stubborn fight. The enemy had left the ground Where we had lain that night. In hollows where the sun was lost
Unthawed still lay the shining snow,
And on the rugged ground the frost
In slender spears did grow.

Close to us, where our final rush
Was made at closing in of day,
We saw, amid an awful hush,
The rigid shapes of clay:

Things, which but yesterday had life, And answered to the trumpet's call, Remained as victims of the strife, Clods of the Valley all!

Then, the grim detail marched away
A grave from the hard soil to wrench,
Wherein should sleep the Blue and Grey
All in a ghastly trench!

A thicket of young pines arose, Midway upon that frosty ground; A shelter from the winds and snows, And by its edge I found

Two stiffened forms, where they had died, As sculptured marble white and cold, Lying together side by side Beneath one blanket's fold.

My heart already touched and sad, The blanket down I gently drew And saw a sturdy form, well clad From head to heel in Blue.

Beside him, gaunt from many a fast, A pale and boyish "rebel" lay, Free from all pangs of life, at last, In tattered suit of Grey. There side by side those soldiers slept,
Each for the cause that he thought good,
And bowing down my head I wept
Through human brotherhood.

Oh, sirs! it was a piteous thing
To see how they had vainly tried
With strips of shirts, and bits of string,
To stay life's ebbing tide!

The story told itself aright;
(Print scarce were plainer to the eye)
How they together in the night
Had laid them down to die.

The story told itself, I say,
How smitten by their wounds and cold
They'd nestled close, the Blue and Grey,
Beneath one blanket's fold.

All their poor surgery could do
They did to stop their wounds so deep,
Until at last the Grey and Blue
Like comrades fell asleep.

We dug for them a generous grave, Under that sombre thicket's lee, And there we laid the sleeping brave To wait God's reveillé.

That grave by many a tear was graced
From ragged heroes ranged around,
As in one blanket they were placed
In consecrated ground.

Aye! consecrated, without flaw,
Because upon that bloody sod,
My soul uplifted stood and saw
Where Christ had lately trod!

THE LEE MEMORIAL ODE

"Great Mother of great Commonwealths"
Men call our Mother State:
And she so well has earned this name
That she may challenge fate
To snatch away the epithet
Long given her of "great."

First of all Old England's outposts To stand fast upon these shores Soon she brought a mighty harvest To a People's threshing floors, And more than golden grain was piled Within her ample doors.

Behind her stormy sunrise shone, Her shadow fell vast and long, And her mighty Adm'ral, English Smith, Heads a prodigious throng Of as mighty men, from Raleigh down, As ever arose in song.

Her names are the shining arrows Which her ancient quiver bears, And their splendid sheaf has thickened Through the long march of the years, While her great shield has been burnished By her children's blood and tears.

Yes, it is true, my Countrymen, We are rich in names and blood, And red have been the blossoms From the first Colonial bud, While her names have blazed as meteors By many a field and flood.

And as some flood tumultuous
In sounding billows rolled Gives back the evening's glories
In a wealth of blazing gold:
So does the present from its waves
Reflect the lights of old.

Our history is a shining sea
Locked in by lofty land
And its great Pillars of Hercules,
Above the shining sand,
I here behold in majesty
Uprising on each hand.

These Pillars of our history, In fame forever young, Are known in every latitude And named in every tongue, And down through all the Ages Their story shall be sung.

The Father of his Country
Stands above that shut-in sea
A glorious symbol to the world
Of all that's great and free;
And to-day Virginia matches him—
And matches him with Lee.

Who shall blame the social order Which gave us men as great as these? Who condemn the soil of t' forest Which brings forth gigantic trees? Who presume to doubt that Providence Shapes out our destinies?

Fore-ordained and long maturing, Came the famous men of old: In the dark mines deep were driven Down the shafts to reach the gold, And the story is far longer Than the histories have told.

From Bacon down to Washington The generations passed, Great events and moving causes Were in serried order massed: Berkeley well was first confronted, Better George the King at last! From the time of that stern ruler To our own familiar days Long the pathway we have trodden, Hard, and devious were its ways Till at last there came the second Mightier Revolution's blaze.

Till at last there broke the tempest Like a cyclone on the sea, When the lightnings blazed and dazzled And the thunders were set free—And riding on that whirlwind came Majestic, Robert Lee!

Who—again I ask the question— Who may challenge in debate, With any show of truthfulness, Our former social state Which brought forth more than heroes In their lives supremely great?

Not Peter, the wild Crusader, When bent upon his knee, Not Arthur and his belted Knights, In the Poet's Song, could be More earnest than those Southern men Who followed Robert Lee.

They thought that they were right and this Was hammered into those Who held that crest all drenched in blood,
Where the "Bloody Angle" rose.
As for all else? It passes by
As the idle wind that blows.

Then stand up, oh my Countrymen! And unto God give thanks, On mountains, and on hillsides And by sloping river banks—
Thank God that you were worthy Of the grand Confederate ranks:

That you who came from uplands And from beside the sea, Filled with love of Old Virginia And the teachings of the free, May boast in sight of all men That you followed Robert Lee.

Peace has come. God give His blessing On the fact and on the name! The South speaks no invective And she writes no word of blame; But we call all men to witness That we stand up without shame.

Nay! Send it forth to all the world That we stand up here with pride, With love for our living comrades And praise for those who died: And in this manly frame of mind Till death we will abide.

God and our consciences alone
Give us measure of right and wrong;
The race may fall unto the swift
And the battle to the strong:
But the truth will shine in history
And blossom into song.

Human grief full oft by glory
Is assuaged and disappears
When its requiem swells with music
Like the shock of shields and spears,
And its passion is too full of pride
To leave a space for tears.

And hence, to-day, my Countrymen, We come with undimmed eyes, In homage of the hero Lee, The good, the great, the wise! And at his name our hearts will leap Till his last old soldier dies,

Ask me, if so you please, to paint Storm winds upon the sea; Tell me to weigh great Cheops— Set volcanic forces free; But bid me not, my Countrymen, To picture Robert Lee!

As Saul, bound for Damascus fair, Was struck blind by sudden light, So my eyes are pained and dazzled By a radiance pure and white Shot back by the burnished armor Of that glory-belted Knight.

His was all the Norman's polish And sobriety of grace; All the Goth's majestic figure; All the Roman's noble face; And he stood the tall exemplar Of a grand historic race.

Baronial were his acres where Potomac's waters run; High his lineage, and his blazon Was by cunning heralds done; But better still he might have said Of his "works" he was the "son."

Truth walked beside him always
From his childhood's early years,
Honor followed as his shadow,
Valor lightened all his cares:
And he rode—that grand Virginian—
Last of all the Cavaliers!

As a soldier we all knew him Great in action and repose, Saw how his genius kindled And his mighty spirit rose When the four quarters of the globe Encompassed him with foes. But he and his grew braver As the danger grew more rife, Avaricious they of glory But most prodigal of life, And the "Army of Virginia" Was the Atlas of the strife.

As his troubles gathered round him, Thick as waves that beat the shore, Altra Cura rode behind him, Famine's shadow filled his door; Still he wrought deeds no mortal man Had ever wrought before.

Then came the end, my Countrymen, The last thunderbolts were hurled! Worn out by his own victories His battle flags were furled And a history was finished That has changed the modern world.

As some saint in the arena
Of a bloody Roman game,
As the prize of his endeavor,
Put on an immortal frame,
Through long agonies our Soldier
Won the crown of martial fame.

But there came a greater glory To that man supremely great (When his just sword he laid aside In peace to serve his State) For in his classic solitude He rose up and mastered Fate.

He triumphed and he did not die!—
No funeral bells are tolled—
But on that day in Lexington
Fame came herself to hold
His stirrup while he mounted
To ride down the streets of gold.

He is not dead! There is no death! He only went before
His journey on when Christ the Lord
Wide open held the door,
And a calm celestial peace is his:
Thank God! forevermore.

When the effigy of Washington In its bronze was reared on high 'Twas mine, with others, now long gone, Beneath a stormy sky, To utter to the multitude His name that cannot die.

And here to-day, my Countrymen,
I tell you Lee shall ride
With that great "rebel" down the years—
Twin "rebels" side by side!—
And confronting such a vision
All our grief gives place to pride.

Those two shall ride immortal And shall ride abreast of Time, Shall light up stately history And blaze in Epic Rhyme— Both patriots, both Virginians true, Both "rebels," both sublime!

Our past is full of glories, It is a shut-in sea, The pillars overlooking it Are Washington and Lee: And a future spread before us, Not unworthy of the free.

And here and now, my Countrymen Upon this sacred sod,
Let us feel: It was "Our Father"
Who above us held the rod,
And from hills to sea
Like Robert Lee
Bow reverently to God.

OUR HEROIC DEAD

I.

A King once said of a prince struck down,
"Taller he seems in death."
And this speech holds truth, for now as then
'Tis after death that we measure men,
And as mists of the past are rolled away
Our heroes, who died in their tattered gray,
Grow "taller" and greater in all their parts
Till they fill our minds as they fill our hearts.
And for those who lament them there's this relief—
That Glory sits by the side of Grief,
Yes, they grow "taller" as the years pass by
And the World learns how they could do and die.

II.

A nation respects them. The East and West, The far-off slope of the Golden Coast, The stricken South and the North agree That the heroes who died for you and me—Each valiant man, in his own degree, Whether he fell on the shore or sea,

Did deeds of which
This Land, though rich
In histories may boast,
And the Sage's Book and the Poet's Lay
Are full of the deeds of the Men in Gray.

III.

No lion cleft from the rock is ours,
Such as Lucerne displays,
Our only wealth is in tears and flowers,
And words of reverent praise,
And the Roses brought to this silent Yard
Are Red and White. Behold!
They tell how wars for a kingly crown,
In the blood of England's best writ down,

Left Britain a story whose moral old Is fit to be graven in text of gold: The moral is, that when battles cease The ramparts smile in the blooms of peace.

And flowers to-day were hither brought From the gallant men who against us fought; York and Lancaster!—Gray and Blue! Each to itself and the other true—

And so I say
Our men in Gray

Have left to the South and North a tale Which none of the glories of Earth can pale.

* * * * * *

That past is now like an Arctic Sea
Where the living currents have ceased to run,
But over that past the fame of Lee
Shines out as the "Midnight Sun:"
And that glorious Orb, in its march sublime,
Shall gild our graves till the end of time!

THE FUTURE HISTORIAN

From "Mahone's Brigade."

In the future some historian shall come forth both strong and wise,

With a love of the Republic, and the truth, before his eyes. He will show the subtle causes of the war between the States, He will go back in his studies far beyond our modern dates, He will trace out hostile ideas as the miner does the lodes, He will show the different habits born of different social codes, He will show the Union riven, and the picture will deplore, He will show it re-united and made stronger than before. Slow and patient, fair and truthful must the coming teacher be To show how the knife was sharpened that was ground to prune the tree.

He will hold the Scales of Justice, he will measure praise and blame.

And the South will stand the verdict, and will stand it without shame.

ARMS AND THE MAN

A Metrical Address recited on the one hundredth anniversary of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown on invitation of a joint committee of the Senate and House of the United States Congress.

XVII.

PATER PATRIAE

Achilles came from Homer's Jove-like brain,
Pavilioned 'mid his ships where Thetis trod;
But he whose image dominates this plain
Came from the hand of God!

Yet of his life, which shall all time adorn
I dare not sing; to try the theme would be
To drink as 'twere that Scandinavian Horn
Whose tip was in the Sea.

I bow my head and go upon my ways,
Who tells that story can but gild the gold—
Could I pile Alps on Apennines of praise
The tale would not be told.

Not his the blade which lyric fables say
Cleft Pyrenees from ridge to nether bed,
But his the sword which cleared the Sacred Way
For Freedom's feet to tread.

Not Cæsar's genius nor Napoleon's skill
Gave him proud mast'ry o'er the trembling earth;
But great in honesty, and sense and will—
He was the "man of worth."

He knew not North, nor South, nor West, nor East:
Childless himself, Father of States he stood,
Strong and sagacious as a Knight turned Priest,
And vowed to deeds of good.

Compared with all Earth's heroes I may say
He was, with even half his virtues hid,
Greater in what his hand refrained than they Were great in what they did.

And thus his image dominates all time, Uplifted like the everlasting dome Which rises in a miracle sublime Above eternal Rome.

On Rome's once blooming plain where'er we stray
That dome majestic rises on the view,
Its Cross a-glow with every wandering ray
That shines along the Blue.

So his vast image shadows all the lands, So holds forever Man's adoring eye, And o'er the Union which he left it stands Our Cross against the sky!

XVIII.

THE FLAG OF THE REPUBLIC

My harp soon ceases; but I here allege
Its strings are in my heart and tremble there:
My Song's last strain shall be a claim and pledge—
A claim, a pledge, a prayer!

I stand, as stood in storied days of old, Vasco Balboa staring o'er bright seas When fair Pacific's tide of limpid gold Surged up against his knees.

For haughty Spain, her banner in his hand,
He claimed a New World, sea, and plain, and crag—
I claim the Future's Ocean for this land,
And here I plant her flag!

Float out, oh flag, from Freedom's burnished lance.
Float out, oh flag, in Red, and White and Blue!
The Union's colors and the hues of France
Commingled on the view!

Float out, oh flag, and all thy splendors wake!
Float out, oh flag, above our Hero's bed!
Float out, oh flag, and let thy blazon take
New glories from the dead!

Float out, oh flag, o'er Freedom's noblest types!
Float out, oh flag, all free of blot or stain!
Float out, oh flag, the "Roses" in thy stripes
Forever blent again!

Float out, oh flag, and float in every clime!
Float out, oh flag, and blaze on every sea!
Float out, oh flag, and float as long as Time
And Space themselves shall be!

Float out, oh flag, o'er Freedom's onward march!
Float out, oh flag, in Freedom's starry sheen!
Float out, oh flag, above the Union's arch
Where Washington is seen!

Float out, oh flag, above a smiling Land!
Float out, oh flag, above a peaceful sod!
Float out, oh flag, thy staff within the hand
Beneficent of God!

SAM HOUSTON

[1793-1863]

GEORGE P. GARRISON

SAM HOUSTON—who, if he was christened Samuel, never called himself by the name or signed it in that form—was of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and was born near Lexington, Virginia, March 2, 1793. His father died in 1806, and soon thereafter his mother moved with the family to Blount County in East Tennessee. There Sam became a clerk in a country store for a time; subsequently he abandoned his place and went to live with the Cherokee Indians until he was about eighteen years old. He then rejoined the whites and taught school for a while, and later became himself a student of the Academy of Maryville.

Houston's previous education had been obtained in the course of a few months' attendance at a country school; but he had learned to read and was fond of it. While the range of literature which circumstances opened to him was rather narrow, it included the Bible, Shakespeare, and Pope's translation of the Iliad; and of these, being endowed with a strong and active intellect, he made the most. He had a rather remarkable gift of language, and his speeches and letters leave the impression of a culture which was out of all proportion to his opportunity.

In 1813 Houston enlisted as a private soldier in a Tennessee regiment of volunteers, and a little later he received an appointment as ensign. His regiment was a part of General Jackson's force at the battle of To-ho-pe-ka, or Horseshoe Bend, on the Tallapoosa River in Alabama, which was fought August 27, 1814. In this battle Houston acquitted himself with distinguished bravery, being severely wounded, and in consequence he was promoted to a lieutenancy. He remained in the service till 1818, when he resigned.

After leaving the army Houston studied law and began practice; but his attention was soon diverted to politics, and he held successively the offices of adjutant-general of the State, district-attorney, and major-general of militia. In 1823 he was elected representative in Congress from the Ninth Tennessee District, which office he held for two terms. In 1827 he became Governor of Tennessee; but in April, 1829, before the end of his first term, and in the midst of a race for a second, which he appeared to be winning, he suddenly resigned and went again to live among the Indians. This act was due to a disagreement with his wife which had led to their separation after they had been but a few months married. The details of the trouble were never made public by either of them, and no satisfactory explanation of it can be given.

The Indians whom Houston joined were a branch of the Cherokees living in Arkansas. Among these he lived a dissipated and discreditable life until the approach of the Texas Revolution. He was afterward accused of bringing about this revolution with the connivance of President Jackson in order to promote the interests of slavery. As a matter of fact, he had practically nothing to do with causing the revolution; but when it was already well under way he assumed the leadership in it, for which he was especially fitted both by capacity and by inclination, and carried it to a successful termination.

From this time forward Houston's attention was given mainly to politics.

In September, 1836, after the Mexicans had been finally expelled from Texas and the new republic was enabled to effect a permanent organization for its government, he was chosen president. The Texas Constitution provided that the first president should be elected for two years, and fixed the term thereafter at three; and it made the holder of the office ineligible to succeed himself. Houston therefore retired from the presidency in December, 1838; but in 1841 he was again elected and served until 1844. In 1846, after the annexation of Texas, he became United States Senator, and this office he held till March 4, 1859. He ran for governor in 1857, but was defeated. In 1859 he was again a candidate for governor, and this time he was elected; but in 1861 he was deposed because of his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the seceding government. He then retired to private life and died at his home in Huntsville, Texas, in 1863.

Houston's political career affords a most interesting study. It is hardly too much to say that during the whole of it Texas politics were made to revolve in large measure around his own personality; and this, too, when his leadership was disputed by many men of marked ability, aggressiveness, and character. A very large proportion of those who figured prominently in the affairs of Texas from the Revolution of 1836 to the outbreak of the Civil War were more or less strenuous critics of his policy and conduct, and many of them were his bitter and uncompromising enemies. For his own part, right or wrong, he was never conciliatory. A fierce controversy over his management of the San Jacinto campaign, beginning while the campaign was yet in progress, lasted throughout his life and was the burden of his last speech in the United States Senate. With the progress, however, of the sectionalizing movement in the fifties, personal influences in Texas, as in all the other states, were gradually subordinated to the great issues between the North and South. The tongue of him that did not voice the popular conviction and sentiment lost its persuasiveness, and Houston's effort to stem the rising tide of secession finally broke his hold on Texas altogether and drove him into retirement.

As might be inferred from this sketch of his career. Houston did no literary work for its own sake. What he left in print or manuscript is in the form of letters, speeches, and state papers, incident, for the most part, upon his political activity. These, however, show natural gifts of insight and expression that under a more favorable environment might have made him as notable a figure in literature as he was in politics. It is true that his utterances, from the very nature of the circumstances which prompted them, were often those of the advocate; but they were also not infrequently appeals on behalf of a minority view, or to an audience like the Texan Indians, too commonly intractable to the pleadings of their best white friends. Such conditions tested severely the speaker's power to persuade; and to this test Houston responded with a strength of logic, a knowledge of human nature, and a divination of popular motives, which stamp him at once as a great orator. The effect of his public speeches was enhanced by his splendid presence and his dramatic tendencies. But as a writer he can scarcely be said to have reached the same high level. His words, when put in cold print, have less the impression of the sincere spontaneity that characterizes the best literary effort, and more that of complete selfmastery and guarded self-direction.

That biography of Houston which brings out most impartially the lights and shades of his character is Williams's 'Sam Houston and the War of Independence in Texas.' That in which his literary work can be studied best is Crane's 'Life and Select Literary Remains of Sam Houston.' The second volume of this work—bound with the first—contains the selections referred to in its title. To obtain, however, a complete view of Houston himself from his speeches and writings, one must read the mass of his unpublished correspondence and papers, the larger part of which is —so far as the knowledge of the writer of this sketch extends—in the archives of the Texan government. Bruce's 'Life of General Sam Houston' and Lester's 'Sam Houston and his Republic' (reprinted with additions, but without the author's name, by J. C.

Derby), are brief and unsatisfactory works, which must be used with care, but which should be read by one who wishes to see Houston from every point of view.

TALK TO BORDER INDIANS

Executive Department, Washington, Texas, March 20, 1843.

To the Head Chiefs of the Wichetaws, Ionies, Tow-A-ASHES, WACOES, TA-WACK-ANIES, CADDOES, AND OTHER TRIBES:

BROTHERS:—I send this talk to you by Governor Butler, the agent of our Great Brother, the President of the United States. The words I speak to you are the words of a brother, who has never told his red brothers what was not true.

Between your people and ours there has been war. Trouble has been in the path between us, and it has been stained with blood. While there is war no people can be happy. When the warriors are absent from home their wives and children may be killed by their enemies. If the warriors return with scalps or have stolen horses, it will not bring back their women and children to them. Their wigwams will be desolate, and they will have to kindle new fires, and by them watch for their enemies.

If they make peace, they can rest with their people and be happy. The hunter can kill his buffaloes and the squaws can make corn, and there shall be none to trouble them. We are willing to make a line with you, beyond which our people will not hunt. You shall come to our trading-houses in peace; none shall raise a hand against you, nor make war upon your people. Our traders will have goods such as you may wish to buy, so soon as you have made peace. The goods shall be such as you need, and they will be sold to you cheap. We will have agents to act for you, and see that no one shall do wrong to you.

When you wish to sell our traders horses, mules, peltries, or any other articles, you shall have a good price for them, and you shall not be cheated. You need not doubt the words which I speak to you. If wrong has been done to the red brothers in Texas, it was not done by the chiefs who are now in power. They were bad deeds, and the people condemn them. They are now passed away. It will do us no good to wrong the red brothers. Peace will make the white as well as the red brothers happy. Let us meet in peace and talk together, as men who desire to walk in straight paths. Let the young men of your nations take counsel of their chiefs and wise men. Then they will bring happiness to your people instead of sorrow and trouble.

Our Great Brother, the President of the United States, desires that the chiefs of Texas and the chiefs of the red men should make peace and bury the tomahawk forever. I will send a councilor to the Grand Council of the Cherokees; and (if you send chiefs there) he will make a treaty that will take out of our path the stain of blood and make it white, that we can walk in it and live as brothers; and he will appoint a great council in Texas. Our Great Brother will look upon us with pleasure, and the Great Spirit will give light to the path in which we walk, and our children will follow our counsel and walk in the path which we have made smooth.

Your brother, SAM Houston.

TALK IN MEMORY OF FLACO

Executive Department, Washington, March 28, 1843.

To the Memory of General Flaco, Chief of Lipans:

MY BROTHER:—My heart is sad! A dark cloud rests upon your nation. Grief has sounded in your camp. The voice of Flaco is silent. His words are not heard in council. The chief is no more. His life has fled to the Great Spirit. His eyes are closed. His heart no longer leaps at the sight of the buffalo. The voices of your camp are no longer heard to cry: "Flaco has returned from the chase!" Your chiefs look down on the earth and groan in trouble. Your warriors weep. The loud voices of grief are heard from your women and children. The song of birds is silent. The ears of your people hear no pleasant sound. Sorrow whispers in the winds. The noise of the tempest passes. It is not heard. Your hearts are heavy.

The name of Flaco brought joy to all hearts. Joy was on every face. Your people were happy. Flaco is no longer seen in the fight. His voice is no longer heard in battle. The enemy no longer make a path for his glory. His valor is no longer a guard for your people. The right arm of your nation is broken. Flaco was a friend to his white brothers. They will not forget him. They will remember the red warrior. His father will not be forgotten. We will be kind to the Lipans. Grass shall not grow in the path between us. Let your wise men give the counsel of peace. Let your young men walk in the white path. The gray-headed men of your nation will teach wisdom. I will hold my red brothers by the hand.

SAM HOUSTON.

VALEDICTORY ADDRESS

Made to Congress at Washington, Texas, on retiring from the presidency of the Republic, December 9, 1844.

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AND FELLOW-CITIZENS:

This numerous and respectable assemblage of the free citizens of Texas and their representatives, exhibits the best possible commentary upon the successful action and happy influence of the institutions of our country. We have met together for no purpose but that of adding another testimonial to the practicability of enlightened self-government—to witness a change of officers without the change of office—to obey the high behests of our written Constitution in good-will and fellowship, as members of the same great political family, sensible of our rights and fully understanding our duty.

I am about to lay down the authority with which my countrymen, three years since, so generously and confidingly invested me, and to return again to the ranks of my fellow-citizens. But in retiring from the high office which I have occupied to the walks of private life, I can not forbear the expression of the cordial gratitude which inspires my bosom. The constant and unfailing support which I have had from the people, in every vicissitude, demands of me a candid and grateful acknowledgment of my enduring obligations. From them I have derived a sustaining influence, which has enabled me to meet the most tremendous shocks and to pursue, without faltering, the course which I deemed proper for the advancement of the public interests and the security of the general welfare.

I proudly confess that to the people I owe whatever of good I may have achieved by my official labors, for without the support which they so fully accorded me, I could have acquired neither advantage for the Republic, nor satisfaction for myself.

It is true that collisions have existed between the Executive and the Legislature. Both were tenacious of what they deemed their peculiar privileges; and in the maintenance of which both may have erred.

In various instances, the Executive was constrained by what he believed to be his most solemn duty to his conscience and his country, to interpose his prerogative to arrest immature, latitudinous, and dangerous legislation. Under the Constitution, his weight in the enactment of laws is just equal to two-thirds of either House of Congress. Were it otherwise he would be but little more than a mere automaton, and the balance of power and the coördinate character of these two divisions of Government would be utterly destroyed. The Executive has never denied to the Congress purity of motive and honesty of purpose. He has sincerely lamented the existence of any cause, apparent or real, for the occasional disagreements which have occurred, and has deplored the necessity of resorting to the Executive veto to save the country from still greater evils. In the exercise of this power he was aware that two-thirds of the Legislature could correct any error he might commit; and that beyond them stood the Judiciary, as the final umpire to decide between him and them, and preserve the Constitution inviolate.

I have now no reason to conceal the convictions of my judgment or the feelings of my heart. I stand here not to ask the concurrence of any branch of the Government in any of my acts, but to declare, in all sincerity, that the differences to which I have alluded, and the necessity for which I truly regret, arose on my part from a patriotic conception of duty. I may have been mistaken. In my retirement, therefore, I take with me no animosities. If ever they existed they are buried in the past; and I would hope that those with whom it was my lot to come in conflict, in the discharge of my official functions, will exercise toward my acts and motives the same degree of candor.

In leaving my station, I leave the country tranquil at home, and, in effect, at peace with all nations. If some annovances still exist on the frontier, it will be remembered that it has taken years to attain our present position. The savage hordes by whom we have been molested, have at length, by the policy I have pursued with constancy, become generally peaceful. The occasional difficulties which arise are not to be compared with those of former days.

It is not reasonable to suppose that a work of so great magnitude and importance could be accomplished in a little while. Some twelve or fourteen different tribes of Indians. not harmonizing among themselves, and accustomed to depredate upon all around them, had long carried on hostilities upon our borders and despoiled us of our citizens. With them we have at last, I trust, succeeded in establishing a lasting friendship.

Our foreign relations, so far as the United States, France. England, Holland, and some of the principal states of Germany are concerned, are of the most agreeable character, and we have every assurance of their continuance. As to Mexico, she still maintains the attitude of nominal hostility. Instructed by experience, she might be expected to have become more reasonable; but the vain-glorious and pompous gasconade so characteristic of that nation would indicate that she is not quite ready to acknowledge the independence we have achieved. If, however, she attempts the infliction of the injuries which she has so often denounced, I am fully assured that the same spirit which animated the heroic men who won the liberty we now enjoy, will call to the field a yet mightier host to avenge the wrongs we have endured, and establish beyond question our title to full dominion over all we claim.

When I look around me, my fellow-citizens, and see and know that the prospects of the Republic are brightening, its resources developing, its commerce extending, and its moral influence in the community of nations increasing, my heart is filled with sensations of joy and pride. A poor and despised people a few years ago, borne down by depressing influences at home and abroad, we have risen, in defiance of all obstacles, to a respectable place in the eye of the world. One great nation is inviting us to a full participancy in all its privileges, and to a full community of laws and interests. Others desire our separate and independent national existence, and are ready to throw into our lap the richest gifts and favors.

The attitude of Texas now, to my apprehension, is one of peculiar interest. The United States have spurned her twice already. Let her, therefore, maintain her position firmly as it is, and work out her own political salvation. Let her legislation proceed upon the supposition that we are to be and remain an independent people. If Texas goes begging again for admission into the United States she will only degrade herself. They will spurn her again from their threshold, and other nations will look upon her with unmingled pity. Let Texas, therefore, maintain her position. If the United States shall open the door and ask her to come into her great family of states, you will then have other conductors, better than myself, to lead you into the beloved land from which we have sprung—the land of broad stripes and bright stars. But let us be as we are until that opportunity is presented, and then let us go in, if at all, united in one phalanx, and sustained by the opinion of the world.

If we remain an independent nation, our territory will be extensive—unlimited.

The Pacific alone will bound the mighty march of our race and our empire. From Europe and America her soil is to be peopled. In regions where the savage and buffalo now roam uncontrolled, the enterprise and industry of the Anglo-American are yet to find an extensive field of development.

With union, industry, and virtue, we have nothing to apprehend. If left alone, we have our destiny in our own hands, and may become a great nation distinguished for its wealth and power.

It is true we have been visited with inconveniences and evils. It is but a short time since we were without a currency—without available means, and everything to do, for our national paper was depreciated to almost nothing. A currency, however, has been at length established. Hard money is disbursed by the Government and circulates in the community. The period has arrived, I hope, when this currency may be maintained, and all other eschewed, unless intended as a representative of the precious metals actually in deposit. And I would not recommend the extension of the system further than merely to give the necessary facilities, as a medium of transmission or exchange. Relying upon the disposition of Congress not to extend their appropriations beyond the revenues arising from import duties, and the direct taxes secured, it will be seen that the Government can move on, and, at the same time, sustain the currency.

In the advancement of the Republic, from the earliest period of its history up to the present moment, we think we have demonstrated to the world our capacity for self-government. Among our people are to be found the intelligent and enterprising from almost every part of the globe. Though from different states and of different habits, manners, sects, and languages, they have acted with a degree of concord and unanimity almost miraculous.

The world respects our position, and will sustain us by their good opinion, and it is to moral influences that we should look, as much as to the point of the bayonet or the power of the cannon.

My countrymen! Give to the rising generation instruction. Establish schools everywhere among you. You will thus diffuse intelligence throughout the mass—that greatest safeguard to our free institutions. Among us, education confers rank and influence—ignorance is the parent of degradation. Intelligence elevates man to the highest destiny, but ignorance degrades him to slavery.

In quitting my present position, and a second time retiring from the Chief-Magistracy of the Republic, I feel the highest satisfaction in being able to leave my countrymen in the enjoyment of civil and religious freedom and surrounded by many evidences of present and increasing prosperity. This happy condition is ascribable to that wise and benign Providence which has watched over our progress, and conducted us to the attainment of blessings so invaluable. Let us, therefore, strive to deserve the favor of Heaven, that we may be established in all the privileges of freemen, and achieve that destiny which is always accorded to the faithful pursuit of good and patriotic objects.

It is unnecessary for me to detain you longer. I now, therefore, take leave of you, my countrymen, with the devout trust that the God who has inspired you with faithful and patriotic devotion will bless you with His choicest gifts. I shall bear with me into the retirement in which I intend to pass the remainder of my life the grateful and abiding recollection of your many favors.

SPEECH IN DEFENCE OF THE CONDUCT OF THE SAN JACINTO CAMPAIGN

Delivered in the United States Senate, February 28, 1859.

WITHIN a very few days, Mr. President, my political life will terminate. Previous to that event, I deem it due to myself, and to the truth of history, as well as to posterity, that I should be indulged in vindicating myself against uncalled-for charges and unjustifiable defamation. Were it necessary, in retiring from official position, to cite illustrious examples for such a course, I could cite that of General Washington, who felt it necessary, with his large, his immeasurable renown, to offer a refutation of anonymous calumnies which had been circulated against him, and to specify the particular facts in relation to them. I find, too, that General Jackson, in his lifetime, deemed it proper to file a vindication of himself, which was not disclosed until after his decease. Not wishing to place myself in a category with these illustrious men, I nevertheless feel that it is due to myself that I should vindicate my character from the attacks that have been made upon me. Within the next month, I shall have served my country, with few intervals, for a period of forty-six years. How that service has been performed, I leave to posterity to determine. My only desire is that truth shall be vindicated, and that I may stand upon that foundation, so far as posterity may be concerned with my action, that they may have an opportunity of drawing truthful deductions. Either of the illustrious patriots referred to might have spared much of their world-renowned distinction, and yet have had a world-wide fame left. More humble in my sphere than they were; more circumscribed than they, I feel that it is the more necessary for me to vindicate what may justly attach to me, from the fact that I leave a posterity, and from that circumstance I feel a superadded obligation. Neither of those illustrious men left posterity. I shall leave a posterity that have to inherit either my good name, based upon truth, or that which necessarily results to a character that is not unspotted in its public relations. I have been careless of replying to these things for years. I believe no less than ten or fifteen books have been written defamatory of me; and I had hoped, having passed them with very little observation, that, as I approached the close of my political term, and was about to retire to the shades of private life, I should be permitted to enjoy that retirement in tranquillity; that my defamers would not pursue me there with the rancor and hatred with which they pursue an aspiring politician whom they wish to sink or depress. I could see no reason for their continued efforts to detract from my fairly earned reputation.

Mr. President, these were fond anticipations, and they were delightful to cherish. I entertained them with cordiality; they were welcome to my heart. But I find recently, and it is that to which my observation is immediately directed, a production purporting to be a Texas Almanac, which contains what is said to be a narrative of the "campaign of San Jacinto." It has a name attached to it, and purports to be taken from the diary of a gentleman who has the prefix of "Doctor" to his name, to give it weight in society. The individual is unknown. He is a poor dupe, ignorant, I presume, of the contents of the paper which bears his name. It is possible that he never knew a word it contained. It would be difficult to think otherwise; for one avenue to his understanding, he being profoundly deaf, has for many years been closed, and he has given a positive contradiction to the parts of his paper that were considered the most pointed and important.

The object was to assail my reputation, and to show that the battle of San Jacinto, and all the preceding acts of general-ship connected with that event, had been forced upon the general, and that really, on that occasion, he had acted with a delicacy unbecoming a rugged soldier. This is the design. How far it will be successful, I do not pretend to say; but it is strange that such a mass of this work should be produced. I perceive that no less than twenty-five thousand copies of it are to be circulated in the character of a book. It would be rather imposing bound in cloth or leather, but in paper it is not so very important; but still there is something very ostensible about it.

My object, on this occasion, will be to show the true state of facts connected with that campaign, and with the wars of Texas.

* * * * * *

I should not have felt it necessary to reply to the attacks that have been made upon me, were it not that I am to leave a progeny, that might, at some future time, be called on to know why a response was not given to these fabrications, and the denial given to them. There is not one word of truth contained in all the calumnies in this book, or of others, except one, and this is, that the Commander-in-Chief never communicated his counsel to anyone. That is true, and it is the only truth in this or other books on the "campaign of San Jacinto." How could the general permit his designs to be known when mutiny and sedition were rife in camp, and when combinations were formed to thwart every measure that wisdom and prudence could devise, up to the very hour that the troops were formed for battle?

The truth of history has been perverted, and the opposite has been asserted. Contributions of material have been made to this almanac; it was concocted and arranged, and then given to the world in such a shape that the dissemination of the calumny throughout the United States must affect the individual to whom it was directed, and make some impression upon him, and destroy his reputation.

Good reasons have actuated me on this occasion. The characters of the individuals who have propagated these slanders against the Commander-in-Chief are such as are not known to the public at large, and might have weight in society that would poison the true source of history, and subserve, to some extent, their unworthy ends; when, if their characters were known, truth would receive no detriment from their statements.

I regret, Mr. President, that I could not have prepared my matter more at leisure; for it is but a few days past since I contemplated addressing the Senate on this subject. I should then have done it with more pleasure, and with less detention of the honorable body; but this is the last occasion in which I ever expect that my voice will be heard in this Chamber; never again shall I address the President of this body.

Mr. President, in retiring from the duties which have sat lightly upon me in this Chamber since I have been associated with it, though changes have taken place, and successive gentlemen have occupied the seats in the Senate, I have believed, and felt it my duty, to cultivate the relations of good feeling and friendship with each and every gentleman, and I hope the same cordial respect will continue to obtain in this body. I know the high and important duties that devolve upon Senators, and I have confidence that their attention and their great abilities will be called to the discharge of those duties; that they will, on great national subjects, harmonize so as to give vigor to, and cement our institutions; and that they will keep pace in their efforts to advance the country with the progress that seems to invite it onward. My prayers will remain with them, that light, knowledge, wisdom and patriotism may guide them, and that their efforts will be perpetually employed for blessings to our country; that under their influence and their exertions the nation will be blessed, the people happy, and the perpetuity of the Union secured to the latest posterity.

SPEECH OPPOSING SECESSION

Delivered before a mass meeting at Austin, September 22, 1860.

LADIES AND FELLOW-CITIZENS:

I had looked forward and with many pleasing anticipations to this occasion, as I always do to a meeting with my fellow-citizens, hoping that no untoward circumstance would arise to prevent my giving full utterance to my sentiments on the political topics of the day; but ill-health has overtaken me, and I have, against the advice of my physician, arisen from a sick-bed to make my apology for not being able to fill my appointment; but being here, I will endeavor to say a few words in behalf of the Union, and the necessity of union to preserve it, which I trust will not fall unheeded. The condition of the country is such, the dangers which beset it are so numerous, the foes of the Union so implacable and energetic, that no risk should be heeded by him who has a voice to raise in its behalf, and so long as I have strength to stand, I will peril even health in its cause.

I had felt an interest in this occasion, on many accounts. It is said a crisis is impending. The clamor of disunion is heard in the land. The safety of the Government is threatened; and it seemed to me that the time had come for a renewal of our vows of fidelity to the Constitution and to interchange, one with the other, sentiments of devotion to the whole country. I begin to feel that the issue really is upon us, which involves the perpetuity of the Government which we have received from our fathers. Were we to fail to pay our tributes to its worth, and to enlist in its defense, we would be unworthy longer to enjoy it.

It has been my misfortune to peril my all for the Union. So indissolubly connected are my life, my history, my hopes, my fortunes, with it, that when it falls, I would ask that with it might close my career, that I might not survive the destruction of the shrine that I had been taught to regard as holy and inviolate, since my boyhood. I have beheld it, the fairest fabric of Government God ever vouchsafed to man, more than half a century. May it never be my fate to stand sadly gazing on its ruin! To be deprived of it, after enjoying it so long, would be a calamity such as no people yet have endured.

Upwards of forty-seven years ago, I enlisted, a mere boy, to sustain the National flag and in defense of a harassed frontier, now the abode of a dense civilization. Then disunion was never heard of, save a few discordant notes from the Hartford Convention. It was anathematized by every patriot in the land, and the concocters of the scheme were branded as traitors. The peril I then underwent, in common with my fellow-soldiers, in behalf of the Union, would have been in vain, unless the patriotism of the nation had arisen against these disturbers of the public peace. With what heart could these gallant men again volunteer in defense of the Union, unless the Union could withstand the shock of treason and overturn the traitors? It did this: and when again, in 1836, I volunteered to aid in transplanting American liberty to this soil, it was with the belief that the Constitution and the Union were to be perpetual blessings to the human race—that the success of the experiment of our fathers was beyond dispute, and that whether under the banner of the Lone Star or that many-starred banner of the Union, I could point to the land of Washington, Jefferson and Jackson, as the land blest beyond all other lands, where freedom would be eternal and Union unbroken. It concerns me deeply, as it does every one here, that these bright anticipations should be realized; and that it should be continued not only the proudest nationality the world has ever produced, but the freest and most perfect. I have seen it extend from the wilds of Tennessee, then a wilderness, across the Mississippi, achieve the annexation of Texas, scaling the Rocky Mountains in its onward march, sweeping the valleys of California, and laving its pioneer footsteps in the waves of the Pacific. I have seen this mighty progress, and it still remains free and independent. Power, wealth, expansion, victory, have followed in its path, and yet the ægis of the Union has been broad enough to encompass all. Is not this worth perpetuating? Will you exchange this for all the hazards, the anarchy and carnage of civil war? Do you believe that it will be dissevered and no shock felt in society? You are asked to plunge into a revolution; but are you told how to get out of it? Not so; but it is to be a leap in the dark—a leap into an abyss, whose horrors would even fright the mad spirits of disunion who tempt you on.

Our forefathers saw the danger to which freedom would be subjected from the helpless condition of disunited states; and, to "form a more perfect Union," they established this Government. They saw the effect of foreign influence on rival states, the effect of dissensions at home, and to strengthen all and perpetuate all, to bind all together, yet leave all free, they gave us the Constitution and the Union. Where are the evidences that their patriotic labor was in vain? Have we not emerged from an infant's to a giant's strength? Have not empires been added to our domain, and states been created? All the blessings which they promised their posterity have been vouchsafed; and millions now enjoy them, who without this Union would to-day be oppressed and down-trodden in far-off foreign lands!

What is there that is free that we have not? Are our rights invaded and no Government ready to protect them? No! Are our institutions wrested from us and others foreign to our taste forced upon us? No! Is the right of free speech, a free press, or free suffrage taken from us? No! Has our property been taken from us and the Government failed to interpose when called upon? No, none of these! The rights of the states and the rights of individuals are still maintained. We have yet the Constitution, we have yet a judiciary, which has never been appealed to in vain—we have yet just laws and officers to administer them; and an army and navy, ready to maintain any and every constitutional right of the citizen. Whence then this clamor about disunion? Whence this cry of protection to property or disunion, when even the very loudest in the cry declared under their Senatorial oaths, but a few months since, that no protection was necessary? Are we to sell reality for a phantom?

There is no longer a holy ground upon which the footsteps of the demagogue may not fall. One by one the sacred things placed by patriotic hands upon the altar of our liberties, have been torn down. The Declaration of our Independence is jeered at. The farewell counsels of Washington are derided. The charm of those historic names which make glorious our past has been broken, and now the Union is no longer held sacred, but made secondary to the success of party and the adoption of abstractions. We hear of secession—"peaceable secession." We are to believe that this people, whose progressive civilization has known no obstacles, but has already driven back one race and is fast Americanizing another, who have conquered armies and navies-whose career has been onward and never has receded, be the step right or wrong, is at last quietly and calmly to be denationalized, to be rent into fragments, sanctioned by the Constitution, and there not only be none of the incidents of revolution, but amid peace and happiness we are to have freedom from Abolition clamor, security to the institution of slavery, and a career of glory under a Southern Confederacy, which we can never attain in our present condition! When we deny the right of a state to secede, we are pointed to the resolves of chivalric South Carolina and other states; and are told. "Let them go out and you can not whip them back." My friends, there will be no necessity of whipping them back. They will whip themselves, and will not be worth whipping back. Deprived of the protection of the Union, of the ægis of the Constitution, they would soon dwindle into petty states, to be again rent in twain by dissensions or through the ambition of selfish chieftains, and would become a prey to foreign powers. They gravely talk of holding treaties with Great Britain and other foreign powers, and the great advantages which would arise to the South from separation are discussed. Treaties with Great Britain! Alliance with foreign powers! Have these men forgotten history? Look at Spanish America! Look at the condition of every petty state, which by alliance with Great Britain is subject to continual aggression! And yet, after picturing the rise and progress of Abolitionism, tracing it to the Wilberforce movement in England, and British influence in the North, showing that British gold has sustained and encouraged Northern fanaticism, we are told to be heedless of the consequences of disunion, for the advantages of British alliance would far over-estimate the loss of the Union!

How would these seceding states be received by foreign powers? If the question of their nationality could be settled (a difficult question, I can assure you, in forming treaties), what do you suppose would be stipulations to their recognition as powers of the earth? Is it reasonable to suppose that England, after starting this Abolition movement and fostering it, will form an alliance with the South to sustain slavery? No; but the stipulation to their recognition will be, the abolition of slavery. Sad will be the day for the institution of slavery, when the Union is dissolved, and with war at our very doors, we have to seek alliances with foreign powers. Its permanency, its security, are coequal with the permanency and the security of the Union under the Constitution.

When we are rent in twain, British Abolition, which in fanaticism and sacrificial spirit far exceeds that of the North (for it has been willing to pay for its fanaticism, a thing the North never will do), will have none of the impediments in its path now to be found. England will no longer fear the power of the mighty nation which twice has humbled her, and whose giant arm would, so long as we are united, be stretched forth to protect the weakest state or the most obscure citizen. The state that secedes, when pressed by insidious arts of Abolition emissaries, supported by foreign powers, when cursed by internal disorders and insurrections. can lay no claim to that national flag, which when now unfurled, ensures the respect of all nations, and strikes terror to the hearts of those who would invade our rights. No! Standing armies must be kept—armies to keep down a servile population at home, and to meet the foe which at any moment may cross the border, bringing in their train ruin and desolation. Do you wish to exchange your present peaceful condition for the day of standing armies, when all history has proved that a standing army in time of peace is dangerous to liberty? Behold Cuba, with her 20,000 lazy troops, eating the substance of the people and ready at the beck of their masters to inflict some new oppression upon a helpless people; and yet, without a standing army, no state could maintain itself and keep down its servile population.

It is but natural that we all should desire the defeat of the Black Republican candidates. As Southern men, the fact that their party is based upon the one idea of opposition to our institutions, is enough to demand our efforts against them; but we have a broader, a more national cause of opposition to them. Their party is sectional. It is at war with those principles of equality and nationality upon which the Government is formed, and as much the foe of the Northern as of the Southern man. Its mission is to endanger strife, to foster hatred between brethren, and to encourage the formation here of Southern sectional parties equally dangerous to Southern and Northern rights. The conservative energies of the country are called upon to take a stand now against the Northern sectional party, because its strength betokens success. Defeat and overthrow it, and the defeat and overthrow of Southern sectionalism is easy.

I come not here to speak in behalf of a united South against Lincoln. I appeal to the nation. I ask not the defeat of sectionalism by sectionalism, but by nationality. These men who talk of a united South know well that it begets a united North. Talk of frightening the North into measures by threats of dissolving the Union! It is child's play and folly. It is all the Black Republican leaders want. American blood, North nor South, has not yet become so ignoble as to be chilled by threats. Strife begets strife, threat begets threat, and taunt begets taunt, and these disunionists know it. American blood brooks no such restraints as these men would put upon it. I would blush with shame for America, if I could believe that one vast portion of my countrymen had sunk so low that childish threats would intimidate them. Go to the North, and behold the elements of a revolution which its great cities afford. Its thousands of wild and reckless young men, its floating population, ready to enter into any scheme of adventure, are fit material for demagogues to work upon. To such as these, to the great hive of working population, the wily orator comes to speak in overdrawn language of the threats and the words of derision and contempt of Southern men. The angry passions are roused into fury, and regardless of consequences they cling to their sectional leaders. As well might the Abolitionists expect the South to abandon slavery, through fear that the North would go out of the Union and leave it to itself. No, these are not the arguments to use. I would appeal rather to the great soul of the nation than to the passions of a section. I would say to Northern as well as Southern men, "Here is a party inimical to the rights of the whole country, such a party as Washington warned us against. Let us put it down"; and this is the only way it can be put down.

The error has been that the South has met sectionalism by sectionalism. We want a Union basis, one broad enough to comprehend the good and true friends of the Constitution at the North. To hear Southern disunionists talk, you would think the majority of the Northern people were in this Black Republican party; but it is not so. They are in a minority, and it but needs a patriotic movement like that supported by the conservatives of Texas, to unite the divided opposition to that party there and overthrow it. Why, in New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey alone, the conservatives had a majority of over 250,000 at the last Presidential election, and in the entire North a majority of about 270,000.* Because a minority at the North are inimical to us, shall we

^{*}In the six Northern States—New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maine and Wisconsin—where elections have been held, the Republicans have gained over the State elections of 1856, 37,145. Leaving out Connecticut, where the gain is 37,715, owing to the fact that the Black Republicans had not organized for the State election in 1856, there has been a falling off. As compared with the Presidential vote of 1856, they stand:

1856	1860
Republican265,357	Republican254,875
Opposition186,121	Opposition215,670
Black Republican majority in	1856 79,236
Black Republican majority in I	86039,205
Opposition gain	40,031
	451,478
	470,545

It will thus be seen that on a gain in the popular vote of 19,067, the Black Republicans fell off 40,031.

cut loose from the majorify, or shall we not rather encourage the majority to unite and aid us?

I came not here to vindicate candidates or denounce them. They stand upon their records. If they are national, approve them; if they are sectional, condemn. Judge them by the principles they announce. Let past differences be forgotten in the determination to unite against sectionalism. I have differed with all three of the candidates; but whenever I see a man at this crisis coming boldly up to the defense of the Constitution of the country, and ready to maintain the Union against its foes, I will not permit old scores to prejudice me against him. Hence I am ready to vote the Union ticket, and if all the candidates occupy this national ground, my vote may be transferred to either of them. This is the way to put Mr. Lincoln down. Put him down constitutionally, by rallying the conservative forces and sacrificing men for the sake of principles.

But, if through division in the ranks of those opposed to Mr. Lincoln, he should be elected, we have no excuse for dissolving the Union. The Union is worth more than Mr. Lincoln, and if the battle is to be fought for the Constitution, let us fight it in the Union and for the sake of the Union. With a majority of the people in favor of the Constitution, shall we desert the Government and leave it in the hands of the minority? A new obligation will be imposed upon us, to guard the Constitution and to see that no infraction of it is attempted or permitted. If Mr. Lincoln administers the Government in accordance with the Constitution, our rights must be respected. If he does not, the Constitution has provided a remedy.

No tyrant or usurper can ever invade our rights so long as we are united. Let Mr. Lincoln attempt it, and his party will scatter like chaff before the storm of popular indignation which will burst forth from one end of the country to the other. Secession or revolution will not be justified until legal and constitutional means of redress have been tried, and I cannot believe that the time will ever come when these will prove inadequate.

These are no new sentiments to me. I uttered them in the American Senate in 1856. I utter them now. I was denounced then as a traitor. I am denounced now. Be it so! Men who never endured the privation, the toil, the peril that I have for my country, call me a traitor because I am willing to yield obedience to the Constitution and the constituted authorities. Let them suffer what I have for this Union, and they will feel it entwining so closely around their hearts that it will be like snapping the cords of life to give it up. Let them learn to respect and support one Government before they talk of starting another. I have been taught to believe that plotting the destruction of the Government is treason; but these gentlemen call a man a traitor because he desires to sustain the Government and uphold the Constitution.

Who are the people who call me a traitor? Are they those who march under the national flag and are ready to defend it? That is my banner! I raised it in Texas last summer, and when the people saw shining amid its stars and stripes, "The Constitution and the Union," they knew it was no traitorous flag. They rallied to it; but these gentlemen stood aloof. I bear it still aloft; and so long as it waves proudly o'er me, even as it has waved amid stormy scenes where these men were not, I can forget that I am called a traitor.

Let those who choose, add to my watchword, "the enforcement of the law." If they maintain the Constitution and the Union, the enforcement of the laws must follow.

But, fellow-citizens, we have a new party in our midst. They have deserted the old Democracy, and, under the lead of Mr. Yancey, have started what they call a Southern Constitutional party. They say that they could not get their constitutional rights in the national Democracy; and because the platform was adopted which they all indorsed and under which they all fought in 1856, they seceded. It will be recollected that I objected to that platform in 1856; but I was declared to be wrong. They all denounced me then; but now they suddenly see that the platform won't do, and they secede to get their constitutional rights. They are the keepers of the Constitution; they don't want anything but the Constitution, and they won't have anything but the Constitution. They have studied it so profoundly that they claim to know better what it means than the men who made it. They have nominated Southern Constitutional candidates, and have men traveling about the country expounding the Constitution: and yet there is scarcely one of them but will tell you that, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Lincoln may be elected in the mode pointed out by the Constitution and by a constitutional majority, they will not submit. You hear it from the stump, you read it in their papers and in their resolutions, that if Mr. Lincoln is elected the Union is to be dissolved. Here is a constitutional party that intends to violate the Constitution because a man is constitutionally elected President. Here is a constitutional party that proclaims it treasonable for a man to uphold the Constitution. If the people constitutionally elect a President, is the minority to resist him? Do they intend to carry that principle into their new Southern Confederacy? If they do, we can readily conceive how long it will last. They deem it patriotism now to overturn the Government. Let them succeed, and in that class of patriots they will be able to outrival Mexico.

But who are the teachers of this new-fangled Southern Constitutional Democracy? Are they not men like Yancey and Wigfall, who have been always regarded as beyond the pale of national Democracy—transplants from the South Carolina nursery of disunion? Whenever and wherever the spirit of nullification and disunion has shown itself, they and their coadjutors have been found zealously at work. They have been defeated time and again; but like men who have a purpose, they have not ceased their efforts. No sacrifice of pride or dignity has been deemed too great if it assisted in the great purpose of disunion. What if they assailed the Constitution of 1850? They indorsed it in the platform of 1852. From non-intervention they turn to intervention! From the peculiar advocates of State Rights, denying the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, they become the advocates of the Supreme Court as an arbiter, and shout for the Dred Scott decision. Anything for disunion! They can as readily dissolve the Union upon one issue as another. At the Nashville Convention they determined to dissolve it unless the Missouri Compromise line was extended to the Pacific. In 1854 they deemed the existence of this line a cause of separation, and demanded its repeal. The admission of Kansas was the next ultimatum, and now it is the election of Mr. Lincoln. Should they fail, it will then be the adoption of the Slave Code and the repeal of the laws making the slave trade piracy.

These men of convenient politics intend to hang the peaceable and law-loving citizens of the country if they take office under Lincoln. You are to have no postmasters, no mails, no protection from the United States Army, no officers of the Government in your midst, for fear of these Southern Constitutional Democrats. One of them, Colonel Wigfall, your illustrious Senator, said upon the northern line of Virginia some time since, that if Lincoln was elected I would be one of the men who would take office, and have to leave Texas to keep from being "tarred and feathered." And this is the kind of talk by which men are to be driven into resisting the constituted authorities, and yielding their liberties into the hands of these Southern Constitutional Democrats. Now let me ask whether the most humble citizen, who deems it his duty to obey the laws, has not an equal claim to consideration with these men? Whenever the time comes that respect for the Constitution of our fathers leads to the scaffold or the block, he who falls a martyr in its defense will have a prouder fate than those who survive its destruction to share the ruin that will follow.

What do these men propose to give you in exchange for this Government? All are ready to admit their ability to pull down, but can they build up? I have read of the glory of a Southern Confederacy, and seen the schemes of rash enthusiasts: but no rational basis has been presented—none that would sustain a government six months. They take it for granted that because the Union has self-sustaining powers, they need but call a Southern Convention, secede, set up for themselves, and all will go on smoothly. But where are their Washingtons, their Jeffersons, and Madisons? Where is the spirit of sacrifice and patriotism which brought the Union into existence, and maintained it amid privation and danger? Look at the men who are crying out disunion, and then ask yourselves whether they are the men you would choose to create a new government? Do they combine that wisdom, prudence, and patriotism which would inspire you with confidence and lead you to trust the destinies of a nation in their hands?

Where are the proofs of their patriotism? Point to one of them, leading this secession movement, who has ever raised his arm or bared his bosom to the foe, in defense of the honor of his country, save Jefferson Davis; and even he, whose chivalrous bearing in battle does not excuse trifling with the safety of the Union, is thrown in the background by the impetuous Yancey, Wigfall, Keitt, and Rhett.

If the wisdom of the past century combined has not sufficed to perfect this Government, what hope can we have for another? You realize the blessings you have: give them up and all is uncertainty. Will you have more protection to your property—more rights, and have them better protected? We now have all that we ever could have under any government, and notwithstanding all the complaints we hear, they are as perfect as at any time since the formation of the Government. Because we carry the question of niggerism into national politics, and it engenders bad feeling, it is no reason for believing that our rights are invaded. We still have the institution of slavery. All the legislation on the subject for the past twenty years has been to secure it to us, so long as we may want it. It is our own, and the North has nothing to do with it. The North does not want it, and we have nothing to do with that. Their customs are their own. They are guaranteed to them just as ours are to us. We have the right to abolish slavery they have the right to establish it. It is our interest to have it. Climate, soil, association—all make the institution peculiarly suited to us. If it were to their interest, the people of the North would have it. Even in Massachusetts, as I told them a few years since in Boston, they would have it yet, but for the fact that it would not pay. Now, when the "cotton states" are "precipitated into a revolution," and the Southern Confederacy is formed, is the idea of State Rights to be maintained, or is there to be a centralized government, forbidding the states to change their institutions, and giving peculiar privileges to classes? I warn the people to look well to the future. Among the unsatisfied and corrupt politicians of the day, there are many who long for title and power. There are wealthy knaves who are tired of our simple republican manners; and they have pliant tools to work upon in the forum and with the pen.

long as the Union lasts, the masses need not fear them—when it falls, aristocracy will rear its head.

Whenever an encroachment is made upon our constitutional rights, I am ready to peril my life to resist it; but let us first use constitutional means. Let us resist, as our fathers did, with right on our side. They exhausted all legal means of remedy first. When submission to tyranny or revolution was all that was left them, they tried revolution. It was the same in Texas. The people fought to uphold the Constitution of 1824. When it was again violated, they sent petitions to the Central Government. Their agent was imprisoned, and an army was sent to disarm them. Then they raised the standard of revolution. In the share I have borne in these things I claim nothing more than the right to love my country in proportion as I have done my duty to it; but I may ask, what higher claim have these men, who would inaugurate revolutions before their time?

* * * * * *

I look around me and behold men of all parties. I appeal to you, old line Whigs, who stood by him of the lion heart and unbending crest, gallant Henry Clay. I ask you, did you ever hear from his lips a word disloyal to the Constitution and the Union? Did he ever counsel resistance to the laws? Gallantly he led you on, inspired you with devotion to his fortunes and principles. When defeat overwhelmed you and him, did he ever seek to plunge the country into a revolution? In all that glorious career, did Henry Clay ever utter a word of treason? No! There was a broad spirit of nationality pervading his life. While unbending, so far as his political views were concerned, there was a conservatism in his character which elevated his patriotism above considerations of party and made him a man for the whole country. You may say I was opposed to Clay while he lived. True, I was on questions of ordinary politics; but the barriers of party never divided us when the good of the country was at stake. There were national issues when his great mind bent all its energies for but one end, and that the glory and perpetuity of the Union. There were common sentiments, which had come down from the patriots of the Revolution and the founders of our Government, to which he and I could subscribe. Whenever these were at issue, I beheld him the champion of the Union driving back its foes by the power of his eloquence. Would that the tones of that voice of his could once more fall upon the ear of the people and thrill the national heart! Treason, secession. and disunion would hide themselves as of yore. He was the Ajax whose battle-axe glistened aloft in the thickest of the fight for the Compromise of 1850. Whenever we saw his helmet plumes proudly waving, we knew that the battle was going well. Old Whigs, recollect who were his foemen then! Behold them now swelling the ranks of disunion! With the memory of your gallant leader before you, will you go with them? I stood with Clay against Yancey and his coadjutors. The same illustrious Wigfall, who now denounces me as a traitor upon my native soil, then proclaimed Houston and Rusk as traitors for their support of that measure. But the people condemned them, just as they will condemn them now. The conservatism of the land rose against them just as it is rising now. They were rebuked, and the country had peace until the Nebraska and Kansas bill came—that charmer, which was to bring peace, security, and power to the South. Scarce a ripple was seen on the popular current when it came. I saw the storm gathering as it passed and strove to arrest it. Would that I could have been successful; but yet you cast me off. I do not taunt you with the results. My last prediction has been fulfilled. It has broken up the party. Those who denounced me as a traitor for voting against it were the first to deny the bargain they had made and to break with their Northern friends in reference to its construction, when its construction was as well known at the time of its passage as then. I proclaimed my opposition to it on account of the power it conferred on the territories. And yet the men who then denounced me, now denounce their Northern friends for holding them to the bargain. They denounced me for voting with the Abolitionists; but it was forgotten that the illustrious men of the South stood side by side with Seward, Hale, Giddings, and the rest, against Henry Clay, in the battle for the compromise. I saw then how extremes could meet. Their affiliations were so close that I was reminded of the Siamese twins; and yet they were never branded as traitors.

I have appealed to the old Whigs. Let me now invoke the shade of Andrew Jackson and ask Democrats whether the doctrines which in these latter days are called Southern Constitutional Democracy, were democracy then? Men of 1832, when flashed that eagle eye so bright, when more proudly stood that form that never quailed, as when repelling the shock of disunion? Jackson was the embodiment of Democracy then. He came forth in the name of the people and fought these heresies which are now proclaimed here as democracy. Democrats, you remember! Whigs, you remember! how Clay and Webster aided Jackson to put down nullification and secession! Will you stand back now, when both are openly avowed by sectionalists North and South?

JOSEPH HOLT INGRAHAM

[1809-1860]

DAVID H. BISHOP

JOSEPH HOLT INGRAHAM was born in Portland, Maine, on January 26, 1809. His ancestry was typically New England. The immigrant ancestor came from England in 1690; his son settled at Portsmouth, Massachusetts, in 1720; and his grandson, the grandfather of J. H. Ingraham, settled at Falmouth, now Portland, Maine. In another line J. H. Ingraham was descended from Judge John Phillips, of Boston, great-grandfather of the late Phillips Brooks. In England the Ingraham family is traced back to Sir Randolph Ingraham in the reign of Henry II. In Portland, the birthplace and boyhood home of Longfellow, N. P. Willis, and Sargeant S. Prentiss, J. H. Ingraham spent his youth, and there he received his early education.* His father was the owner of shipping vessels, and the son made expeditions on some of these, satisfying, no doubt, the taste for adventure that is manifested in so many of his stories.

About 1830 Ingraham sailed from Portland to New Orleans, to make his home in the South. From the latter place he went to Natchez, where, after some experience in business and in the practice of law, he became a member of the faculty of Jefferson College, an institution in the nearby village of Washington. It was while he held this position that he turned his attention to the writing of tales and novels. The first of these to attract attention, or attain success, was 'The Southwest; by a Yankee,' published in 1835. In this rather formless novel—a description of imaginative scenes and conditions, purporting to be realistic pictures of Southern life-Ingraham gave some offence to the sensitive pride of the people he attempted to portray. No section of the South was better illustrative of the distinctive Southern life of that time than was Natchez. Society was rigidly aristocratic, and the social order was almost as essentially feudal as a European principality of the Fourteenth Century. To a man reared as Ingraham had been, in democratic New England, this life presented itself in an aspect that those who lived it could never see. Seeing themselves through the eyes of an outsider was distasteful to the people of Natchez, especially when there was evident a touch of criticism in the tone of the writer. Criticism involved in much exaggeration was ridicule; and the author was never wholly forgiven, if not quite de trop, during the remainder of his life in Natchez.

^{*}The late Reverend J. P. T. Ingraham, brother of J. H. Ingraham, is authority for the information that J. H. Ingraham was educated at Bowdoin College and that he graduated there. The president of that institution and the registrar as well find no record of his having been a student there.

'The Southwest' was followed by 'Lafitte, the Pirate of the Gulf,' (1836), a story of sea adventure with the title character as the chief actor; 'Burton; or The Sieges,' (1838), a novel of the Revolution, in which the author entered the field of his Southern contemporaries, Kennedy and Simms; and 'Captain Kyd,' a story adequately described by its brief title.

While living at Natchez J. H. Ingraham was married to Miss Mary Brooks, of that town. Shortly after he took up his residence there, S. S. Prentiss, a boyhood friend of Ingraham's, came to Natchez to make it his home. The friendship between the writer and the man who subsequently attained such national fame as an orator and statesman continued and strengthened. It was recognized by Ingraham in the naming of his only son for Prentiss.

The decade '40-'50 was a prolific period for Ingraham. The year 1849 alone was signalized by the publication of not less than nine stories and novels, while the total of the period was something over thirty. Of all these, 'Montezuma, a story of the Aztecs,' was the most important. About 1849, Ingraham removed from Natchez to Nashville, Tennessee; and there he established a school for young ladies. His short residence in Nashville was of momentous importance in his life. During the first year the cholera epidemic raged. and he gave his ministrations to the sick, attended by his brother, the Rev. J. P. T. Ingraham, at that time associate rector of Christ's Church, Nashville. During the remainder of his stay in Nashville he visited the State penitentiary regularly on Sunday afternoons, serving as an unordained chaplain to the prisoners. It was under his brother's influence that he was led to enter into this humanitarian work, and it was largely under the same brother's influence that he turned his attention to the Church and decided to enter its ministry.

It was while Ingraham was in Nashville that he wrote a series of letters for the Philadelphia Saturday Courier under the nom de plume of "Kate Cunningham," who purported to be a New England governess in the South. These letters undertook to defend the South from the extreme charges made by the abolitionists, and were intended in particular to afford an answer to 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' to the publication of which they were immediately subsequent. After Ingraham's death these letters were collected, and published in book form with the title 'The Sunny South.' To the same period belongs 'The Secret of the Cells,' in which the author embodies his experience as a chaplain in the Tennessee penitentiary.

Ingraham was ordained a priest in the Episcopal Church at Jackson, Mississippi, on February 8, 1852. After serving successively as rector of St. John's Church, Mobile, Alabama, and of the Episcopal church at Aberdeen, Mississippi, he was called to the rectorship of Christ's Church, Holly Springs, Mississippi, in the summer of 1858. Here he lived, until his death on December 18, 1860, occupied by his ministerial work, and the writing of the second and third of his Biblical novels, 'The Pillar of Fire' and 'The Throne of David.' The circumstances of his death were tragic. He was returning to his home from the shop of a gunsmith, where he had been to have a pistol repaired, when he stopped for a few minutes in the vestry of his church. In leaving the room, as he picked the weapon from the table, it was discharged, and the bullet struck him in a mortal spot. He died a few days later.* It is worthy of note, as a testimony to the character of his ministerial service and to the esteem of his parishioners, that the shaft which marks the grave of J. H. Ingraham in the Holly Springs Cemetery was provided for by the will of the late Rev. J. T. Pickett, who succeeded him as rector and who came to esteem the memory of his predecessor through the record he had left of his service as rector of Christ's Church.

When Ingraham entered the ministry he determined to turn his back on literature. The wild tales of adventure and of pillage and the very romantic and exceedingly sentimental love stories haunted him out of the past, and the clergyman would have suppressed the work of the author. It seems, however, that it was not the literary but the religious conscience that suffered remorse. Had Ingraham abided by his resolution to forego further literary effort he might have spared himself the endeavors to suppress his works. But the publication of his first Biblical novel, 'The Prince of the House of David,' brought him such fame and popularity that there was a demand upon the publishers for new editions of his almost forgotten works. It is stated that it was his brother, before mentioned, who again influenced him crucially, urging that he might use his talent for writing by taking Biblical situations for a setting and treating imaginatively Biblical characters; thus he could offset the harm that might have ensued from his unworthy works, as he considered them.

However this may be, in 1855, while he was living in Mobile, there appeared his greatest book, 'The Prince of the House of David.' It was immediately popular, and if there had been at that time such careful record of the book mart as at present, it must have been heralded as one of the "best sellers." Nor was its popularity merely temporary; the original publishers put out as many as six editions, and since the expiration of the copyright no less than a dozen different publishers have issued editions, and to-day it is found among the popular cheap editions of books with expired copyrights.

^{*}There has been, and is still, a persistent rumor that Ingraham's death by his own hand was intentional. The members of his family, and the friends who were with him in his illness—during which time he was thoroughly conscious, and could himself relate the circumstances of his death—believed that the firing of the pistol was accidental; the local newspaper published it so; and there does not seem to have been any direct evidence to the contrary.

Ingraham's work deserves distinction in literary records chiefly because he was a pioneer in the field of Biblical fiction. The author's avowed purpose in his trilogy, 'The Prince of the House of David,' 'The Pillar of Fire,' and 'The Throne of David,' was "to draw the attention of those persons who do not read the Bible, or who read it carelessly, to the wonderful events it records, as well as to the divine doctrines it teaches; and to tempt them to seek the inspired sources from which he mainly draws his facts." There is no way of determining how successful this intent may have been, but one must believe that the reverse of this purpose was more fully realized in the fact that the interest in the Bible made a large audience for the writer of the novels.

It is rather difficult for exacting literary judgment to find a just proportion between the popularity of 'The Prince of the House of David' and the intrinsic excellence of the book. The form of narrative chosen by the author is that of a series of letters, written by Adina, a young Jewess, visiting in Palestine, to her father in Alexandria. Thus the author selected a literary form through which it is most difficult to give convincing reality to the scenes and events described. The author is at pains to say in the preface that Adina is supposititious; and it is difficult to forget her supposititious character throughout the thirty-nine letters. She writes with her eye on the theology of the strictly orthodox denominations of the middle years of the Nineteenth Century. The style, even when one allows for the dignified formality of letters of the author's day, is such as could never have belonged to a real correspondence. It is the style of impersonal, rhetorical narrative, frequently declamatory; so that one suspects that Mr. Ingraham wrote clothed in the complete vestments of his clerical order. A scriptural tone that results in an artificial effect in style is imparted to the book by the use of mannerisms of speech—the archaisms of the King James version. The contents of the book are largely the incidents found in the four gospels; and practically all the characters of the gospel are brought forward in connection with the same circumstances and events of the Bible narrative. In this servile following of the incidents of the gospel is evidenced a poverty of resources and a lack of the historic imagination; and chiefly on account of these limitations the book is unconvincing to the literary mind

'The Pillar of Fire,' the first in order of the trilogy, as, in view of the single purpose of the author, the three novels may be termed. was the second written. Its scene is in Egypt, and the action is around Moses as a central figure. The form is the same as that of 'The Prince of the House of David.' Sesostris, a Phœnician prince, goes to Egypt as a student. He becomes an intimate of the Egyptian Court and a friend of Moses, who, as Remeses, ignorant of his Israelitish birth, is living as the son and heir apparent of the Egyptian queen. Sesostris writes letters to his mother at home, and these carry the narrative forward to the point where Moses learns of his parentage and renounces all claim to the throne of Egypt. The narrative is continued by letters from Moses to Sesostris, Aaron, and others, and the replies to these, to the point where Moses and Aaron assume the leadership of the Israelites, preparatory to the Exodus; and thence by letters from Remeses of Damascus, son of Sesostris, who has been sent by his father to visit Egypt, to the point where the Egyptian hosts are drowned in the Red Sea.

'The Pillar of Fire' alone of the other works of Ingraham, offers any comparison to his most famous work in the degree of popularity it attained. From the technical or critical standpoint, it is the superior work of the two. In having the elements of a plot it is nearer the novel form than either one of the other Biblical novels.

'The Pillar of Fire' is again more effective because of the freer rein which the author permitted his imagination, though, as far as the scripture narrative is available, it is strictly followed.

'The Throne of David,' the second in historical order, though the third in order of writing, is the least interesting of the trilogy. The book is adequately described in the words of the author: "The central figure of this work is David, Prophet, Priest and King, and type of Him who, as the last Prince of His house, transferred the Throne of David from earth to heaven-from Jerusalem below to Jerusalem above! It presents David as a shepherd, and a poet; in his friendship with Ionathan; in his victory over the Philistine; in the splendor of his regal magnificence; in his flight from Prince Absalom; and in all the scenes of his later life. Absalom in his rebellion, and Solomon in his kingly glory, are leading features of the work. The aim of the writer is to invest with popular interest one of the most interesting periods of Hebrew history distinguished by the contemporaneous existence of four of the most wonderful men of any age; viz., David, Saul, Samuel the Prophet, and Solomon the greatest and wisest of men."

Literary success, in the highest sense, was not Ingraham's aim. His early work was written for the market; and in his Biblical novels his primary purpose, as repeatedly expressed, was to make people acquainted with the events and characters of scripture narrative. Original settings or imaginative scope he did not attempt; on the contrary, a strict adherence to Biblical color and a faithful reproduction of Biblical incidents were limits Ingraham conscientiously imposed upon himself. Measured by his own aims, he was in a high degree successful. He found the large audience he sought, and he must have made his readers acquainted with the Bible incidents and characters as far as his books present them.

The selections here offered may be taken as illustrative of Ingraham's matter and style. As far as literary expression is considered, his later work is worthier than the earlier; and the fact that the general interest in 'The Pillar of Fire' and 'The Prince of the House of David' was so much greater than it was in the romances and tales of adventure, offers additional reason for selections from these works. The selection from the first narrates the revelation to Moses of the secret of his birth through the mystical power of the Egyptian magicians, a situation where the author allowed himself unusual freedom of treatment. From the latter book the last chapter seems appropriate; it contains the expression of the purpose of the whole book, and it appears typical in a small compass of the qualities characterizing the book throughout.

THE REVELATION TO MOSES OF HIS ISRAELITISH BIRTH

From 'The Pillar of Fire.'

"When I had taken my seat in this chamber of black marble, which was dimly lighted by a misty radiance before me, I saw that I was alone. Now, O Sesostris, came my trial!—such a one as no prince of the house of Pharaoh had ever passed through. It is said that Osirtasen, when he was brought to this chamber, had it revealed to him that he was the son of the god Hercules; but to me was revealed, alas! thou knowest what, and shalt hear how!

"'Remeses-Moses,' said a deep and stern voice from what, in the obscurity, seemed to me a shrine, 'thou art wise, and virtuous, and strong of heart! Gird thyself with courage, and hear what is to be revealed to thee! Know that thou art not the son of Amense, queen of Egypt, as thou believest. She was never a mother!'

"'It is false, thou wicked magician!' I cried, starting to my feet. 'Art thou, then, the foe I am to meet and destroy?'

"'Silence, young man!' cried another voice, with a tone of power. 'What the mysterious oracle utters is true. Thou art not the son of Pharaoh's daughter! Thou hast no title to the throne of Egypt!'

"'Who am I, then?' I cried, impressed and awed, yet full of anger at the words.

"'Thou art the son of a Hebrew mother and a Hebrew father!' said the voice.

"I advanced sword in hand to meet these invisible persons, believing that the insult was but another of the series of tests, and this one in particular, of my patience and temper; for, O Sesostris," added Remeses to me bitterly, "what greater insult could have been put upon a prince of Egypt than this! When I came forward, I saw the wall, as it were, open before me; and I beheld the Nile in bright sunshine; the Island of Rhoda, with its palaces and gardens; the distant towers and obelisks of On, and all the scenery adjacent, but seemingly so near that I could lay my hand upon it all.

"At this surprising spectacle manifesting itself in the dark chambers of the pyramids, I stood amazed and arrested! I felt that it was supernatural, or produced by magic. As I gazed, perplexed, a third voice said:

"Behold! Thou seest that the obelisk of Amense is wanting; that the palace of the governor of the Nile has only its foundations laid. The scene is, as Egypt was thirty-five years

"I looked again, and recognized the truth. I saw it was not the Nile of to-day. I saw, also, that its stream was at a height different from its present mark upon the nilometer. I was amazed, and awaited with intense expectation. Suddenly I saw a party of spearmen enter a hut, which I perceived was one of a group that was occupied by Hebrew workmen who were engaged upon the governor's palace. Presently they came forth, two of them, each bearing an infant aloft upon a spear, which was thrust through it, and followed by shrieking women. I could hear and see all as if I were on the spot. I impulsively advanced to slay the men, for all seemed so real, but as I did so saw at my feet a yawning gulf. Then the men cast the infants into the Nile. I saw three others go into another hut, whence they were driven forth by two desperate Hebrews, who, armed with straw-cutters, slew two of them; but the other fled, and, returning with his comrades, they set fire to the hut of rushes, and consumed the inmates within it. I now perceived that it seemed drawing towards the close of day. From a hut, near the water, a man and a young girl, both Hebrews, stole forth, and collecting bulrushes in their arms, returned to the hut. It was now night. I had seen the shades of evening fall over the scenery, and the stars come out. Yet, by a power incomprehensible to me, I could look into the closed and barred hut, and see that, by the light of a rush dipped in bitumen, three of its inmates were making, in secret haste, a large basket. I saw them finish it, and then beheld the man smear it within and without with pitch. From their conversation I learned that they wished it to resist water, and that they were to commit some precious freight to its frail protection; what, I could not learn; as, when they spoke of it, their colloguy was in low, hushed tones, and with looks of fear. especially the two females, who wept very much. One of them. I learned by their words, was the daughter of the man by a former wife. There was another child, a boy apparently of the age of three years, lying in sweet sleep upon a bed of rushes, made up in a corner of the hut. When the little ark was done, I watched with the deepest interest their further proceedings. At length the three went out together, and to my surprise I saw, by the setting moon, that it was near dawn. They bent their steps, swiftly and silently, toward the ancient temple of Isis, which was then, as now, in ruins, and deserted by every Egyptian, for the sacrilege done therein under the reign of Bnon, the Phœnician Pharaoh. I could see them steal along the tangled avenue beneath the palm trees, and through that of the broken sphinxes, until they came to the pyramidion of the obelisk of Sesostris I. Here a deep, ancient excavation, covered with vines and rushes, showed a flight of broken steps. After carefully looking all about, to see if they were observed, they descended. In a few minutes the three came forth, the elderly woman holding in her arms an infant, upon the beautiful face of which the waning moon shone for a moment, but instantly she hid it with her mantle, and hurried to the river side. Here the man put the basket upon the shore, and extended his arms for the child. The poor mother, as I now perceived she must be, burst into tears, and clasped it closer and closer to her heart.

"'Nay, Jochebeda,' he said, with gentle firmness, 'thy cries will attract notice. The child cannot live if we delay. Hast thou not had warning from the kind Egyptian woman, who was with thee when it was born, and who aided thee in concealing it, that its hiding-place is known, and that in the morning soldiers will be there? Bear up, heart! If we commit it to the Nile, the God of our fathers, in whom we trust, and who will yet return to redeem us, according to His promise to our father Abraham, may guide the frail baris to some secure haven, and provide for the child a pitiful heart to save it.'

"I saw the mother give it its last nourishment at her breast, and then, with tears, lay it softly, sweetly sleeping the while, within the basket of bulrushes—pillowing its head first upon her hand, until the daughter had placed beneath it a pillow of wild-flowers and lotus leaves, gathered on the spot in the dawning light. The father then covered it carefully over, and, kissing it, with grief shaking his strong frame, was about to commit the frail boat to the water, when the poor mother arrested his arm, imploring one more look, one more embrace of her child! She was a young and beautiful woman; and, the last kiss given, kneeled by the shore praying to her God, as the father launched the ark into the stream. At this moment I beheld, straying upon the bank, as if seeking its parents, the other child that I had seen in the house. I now saw the current take to its embrace the little ark, and upon its bosom bear it downward. In a few moments it lodged amid some rushes, which the mother seeing, she ran hastily, entered the water, passionately kissed her child, and would have offered it the breast again, but the more resolute father sent it once more upon its way. In the vision, I now saw that day had dawned, and that the stir of life on land and water was everywhere visible. The father watched the ark until it could be no longer seen for the curve of the shore, and then drew near to his wife, and gently led her away to the hut—her lingering looks ceaselessly stretched toward the Nile. The little maid. who was not more than twelve or thirteen years of age, having been previously instructed by her mother, followed along the shore to see what would become of the ark. But I weary you, Sesostris, with details, which to me had a sort of fascination, as they were enacted before me in the scenes I beheld."

"And they are deeply interesting to me, my dear Remeses," I said with emotion.

"I followed the ark also," continued Remeses, "until, after several escapes from imminent peril, it lodged against a group of flags, at the moment that a beautiful lady, accompanied by her maids, came to bathe, at the foot of the garden of Pharaoh's palace. At a glance, Sesostris, I recognized, as she was in her youth, my mother—I mean to say, the Queen Amense. I saw her attention drawn to the little ark, in the fate of which I had become intensely interested, little dreaming how much and intimately it concerned me! I heard her bid the maids take the basket out of the river, and her cry of surprise, on opening it and seeing the babe, which answered her with a sorrowful wail, as it were, of appeal. I saw her offer it to the bosoms of three Egyptian nurses in vain, when the little maid, its half-sister, drew near with mingled curiosity and fear, and said:

"'O princess, shall I call one of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?'

"The princess said, 'Go!'

"Immediately the maiden ran with the swiftness of a gazelle, until she came at length to her mother's house. The poor Hebrew woman was at her task, combing flax and weeping as she toiled, feeling that she had parted with her child forever. At the height of her grief the young maid flew in at the door, crying with a voice choked with joy:

"'Mother, run quickly! make no stay! Pharaoh's daughter has found my little brother, taken it from the ark, and sent me for a Hebrew nurse! Come quickly, before any other is found!'

"With a cry of joy, and with hands clasped to heaven in gratitude, I saw the mother about to rush out, wild with happiness, when her daughter said, 'Be calm, mother, or the princess will suspect. Put on your coif! Arrange your dress! Seem quiet, as if you were not its mother!'

"'I will try to do so—oh, I will try to do so!' she said touchingly. I saw that, in her emotion, she did not think of her other boy, who, though hardly four years old, had followed the stream, as if he understood what the ark contained. Him I saw kindly taken pity upon by an Egyptian priest, who carried him away to his house."

Here I uttered an exclamation which attracted the notice of Remeses; for I recollected the story of the young Hebrew ecclesiastic and gold image-caster, dear mother, and saw now that he was this brother of Remeses, and the mystery of the resemblance was solved. I did not make any remark to Remeses, however, in reply to his inquiring look, and he resumed his wonderful narrative.

But I will continue the subject, dear mother, in a subsequent letter.

Sesostris.

LETTER XXV

Palace of Remeses, City of On.

My Dearest Mother:—Your courier reached me yesterday with your important letter, advising me of the refusal of the King of Cyprus to receive your ambassador, or release your subjects; and that you only await my return to declare war. I shall not fail to respond to your call, and will next week leave Egypt for Syria. I have not yet visited the Thebaïd, and the superb temples of Upper Egypt, nor seen the wonderful Labyrinth, nor the Cataracts; but I hope at some future day to revisit this interesting land. I feel, indeed, rejoiced to go away now, as the painful and extraordinary events connected with Remeses have cast a gloom over all things here, and changed all my plans.

But I will resume the narrative, interrupted by the abrupt ending of my last letter. That, with the preceding, as well as this, I shall now send to you, as the seal of secrecy is removed from them by the publicity which has been given to all the events by Remeses.

To return, dear mother, to the account of the scenes which the magicians presented to his vision, in the black marble chamber of the pyramid.

"I now," continued Remeses, "beheld the excited mother reach the presence of the princess, trying to calm the wild tumult of hope and fear in her maternal bosom; and to her, I saw the princess, after many inquiries, commit the charge of the infant.

"'I shall adopt this child, O nurse,' she said; 'bring it, therefore, to the palace daily that I may see it. Take as faithful care of it as if it were your own, and you shall be rewarded with my favor, as well as with a nurse's wages.'

"The joyful Hebrew woman tried to repress her happiness, and trembled so that the princess said:

"'Thou art awkward. Carry it tenderly; and see that thou keep this secret closely, or I shall take the boy away from thee, woman, and also punish thee. What is thy name?'

"'Jochebeda,' she answered.

"'And thy husband's?'

"'Amram, your majesty,' she replied.

"I saw her, O Sesostris, when she had well got out of the princess' sight, clasp, by stealth, her recovered child to her bosom, while words of tenderness were in her mouth, and her eyes streaming with tears of gratitude and wonder.

"That child, O Sesostris, was myself!" suddenly exclaimed Remeses. "Of this you have already been convinced. I saw the scene before me rapidly change from day to night, and months and years fly by like a cloud, or like a fleet of ships leaving no trace of their track on the closing waters. Through all I saw myself, from the infant of three years old, taken into the palace from my Hebrew mother, to the boy of twelve—to the youth of twenty! Like the cycle of fate, that scene rolled by before my eyes, until I saw myself, that is, the Hebrew boy, in every scene of my life up to the very moment then present. Then, with a sound of mournful music, the Nile and its scenes slowly faded from before my vision, and I was alone! The whole fearful history had terminated in me, and left me standing there in solitude, to reflect upon what I had seen.

"Rousing myself from my stupor of amazement I staggered back, and sunk in horror upon the stone bench. I know not how long I lay there, but I was at length aroused by a hand upon my shoulder; I looked up and beheld the magician with the emblem of life and the emerald-tipped wand. He said:

"'My son, thou hast read the past of thy life! Wilt thou still be King of Egypt?'

"'By what power hast thou opened the gates of the past? How hast thou known all this?' I cried, with a heart of despair.

"'Dost thou believe?"

"'As if the open Book of Thoth lay before me! I doubt not,' I answered.

"'Wilt thou be King of Egypt?' again asked another voice. A third, in another direction, took it up, and every subterranean echo of the vaulted pyramid seemed to take up the cry. I rushed from the hall, not knowing whither I went. Doors seemed to open before me as if by magic, and I at length found myself emerging, guided by the magician, into the open night. The granite valves of the gate closed behind me, and I was alone, in the quadrangle of the great temple of Thoth. The stars shone down upon me like mocking eyes, watching me. I fled onward, as if I would fly from myself. I feared to reflect. I passed the sphinx, the pylones, the obelisks; and ran along the avenue of the Lake of the Dead, until I reached the Nile. I crossed it in a boat that I found upon the shore, and, without having formed any clear idea of what I ought to do, sought the palace, and gained my mother's anteroom. Did I say 'my mother,' Sesostris? I meant the good queen. I sent in a page to say I wished to see her. In surprise at my return, before the forty days were fulfilled, she came to the door hurriedly, in her nightrobe, and opened it. I entered as calmly as I could, and did not refuse her kiss, though I knew I was but a Hebrew! One night's scenes, dreadful as they were, O Sesostris, could not wholly break the ties of a lifetime of filial love and reverence. I closed the door, secured it in silence, and then sat down, weary with what I had undergone; and, as she came near and knelt by me, and laid her hand against my forehead, and asked me 'if I were ill, and hence had left the temple,' I was overcome with her kindness; and when the reflection forced itself upon me that I could no more call her mother, or be entitled to these acts of maternal solicitude, I gave way to the strong current of emotion, and fell upon her shoulder, weeping as heartily as she had seen me weep when lying in the little ark a helpless infant.

"During this brief moment, a suspicion flashed across my mind that the magicians might have produced this as a part of my trial as a prince—that it was not real, but that by their wonderful arts of magic they had made it appear so to my vision. I seized upon this idea as a man drowning in the Nile grasps at a floating flower.

"'Mother,' I said, 'I am ill. I am also very sorrowful!'

"'The tasks and toils of thy initiation, my son, have been too great for thee. Thy face is haggard and thy looks unnatural. What is thy sorrow?'

"'I have had a vision, or what was like a dream, my mother. I saw an infant, in this vision, before me, placed in an ark, and set adrift upon the Nile. Lo, after being borne by the current some ways, it was espied by a princess who was bathing, whose maids, at her command, brought it to her. It contained a circumcised Hebrew child. The princess, being childless, adopted it, and educated it, and declared it to be her son. She placed him next to her in the kingdom, and was about to resign to him the crown, when----'

"Here my mother, whose face I had earnestly regarded, became pale and trembled all over. She seized my hands, and gasped:

"'Tell me, Remeses, tell me, was this a dream, or hast thou heard it?'

"'I saw it, my mother, in a vision, in the subterranean chamber of the pyramids. It was one of those scenes of magic which the arts of the magi know how to produce.'

"'Dost thou believe it?' she cried.

"'Is it not thy secret, O my mother, which Prince Mœris shares with thee? Am I not right? Does not that Hebrew child,' I cried, rising, 'now stand before thee?'

"She shrieked, and fell insensible!

"At length I restored her to consciousness. I related all I have told you. Reluctantly she confessed that all was true as I had seen it. I then, in a scene such as I hope never to pass through again, assured her I should refuse the throne and exile myself from Egypt. She implored me with strong appeals to keep the secret, and mount the throne. I firmly refused to do so, inasmuch as it would be an act of injustice, not only to Mœris, but to the Egyptians, to deceive them with a Hebrew ruler. She reminded me how, for sixty-one years, Prince Joseph had governed Egypt. 'Yes,' I said, 'but it was openly and without deceit; while my reign would be a gross deception and usurpation.' But, O Sesostris, I cannot revive the scene. It has passed!—I have yielded! She showed me the letters of Prince Mæris. She implored me for her sake to keep the secret, and aid her in resisting the conspiracy of the viceroy. When I reflected that he had made my mother so long miserable, and now menaced her throne, I yielded to her entreaties to remain a few days at the head of the affairs that have been intrusted to my control, and to lead the army against Mæris, should he fulfill his menace to invade Lower Egypt. After that, I said, I shall refuse to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and will retire from the Court."

THE ASCENSION OF CHRIST

From 'The Prince of the House of David.'

LETTER XXXIX

Bethany, Forty Days after the Resurrection.

DEAR FATHER:—With emotions that nearly deprive me of the power to hold my pen, and with trembling fingers that make the words I write almost illegible, I sit down to make known to you the extraordinary event, which will mark this day in all future time as the most worthy to be noted among men.

In my last I informed you that Jesus after his wonderful resurrection, which was declared to all men by infallible proofs, gathered once more his amazed and adoring disciples about him, and taught them, with more than mortal wisdom and eloquence, the great truths appertaining to his kingdom, which he now appointed them to extend throughout all the world.

On the fortieth day, my dear father, early in the morning, he left the house of Mary and Lazarus, where he had sat up with us all night, (for none of us thought of sleep within the sound of his heavenly voice), speaking to us of the glories of heaven, and the excellency of heart and purity of life required of all who should enter it.

"Lord," said Martha, as he went forth, "whither goest thou?"

"Come and see," he answered. "Whither I go ye shall know, and the way ye shall know: for where I am ye shall also be, and all those who believe in me."

"Lord," said Mary, kneeling at his feet, "return at noon, and remain with us during the heat of the day."

"Mary," said Jesus, laying his hand gently upon her fore-head, "I am going to my Father's house! There thou shalt one day dwell with me in mansions not made with hands. Follow me, and thou shalt know the way thither! Through temptation I have first trodden it, through suffering, through death, and through resurrection from the dead. So also must thou and all who love me follow me. To my friends, the gate of the tomb opens into the world of life eternal."

Thus speaking, he walked slowly onward toward the hill of Bethany, not far from the place where Lazarus was buried. He was followed not only by Mary, Martha, Lazarus, and John, my cousin Mary and myself, each of us expecting from his words and manner, some new and great event to take place; but by all the disciples, who had presently joined him near the cemetery, at the foot of the hill. There were at least five hundred persons in all, moving on with him ere he reached the green hillside beyond the village; for all followed him, expecting to hear more glorious revelations from his lips of the life beyond this.

"He goes to the hill to pray," said one of his disciples.

"Nay," said Peter, "he prays not since his resurrection as before. He has no need of prayer for himself, who has conquered sin, Satan, death, the grave and the world!"

"He goeth to show us some mighty miracle, from the expression of power and majesty in his aspect," said Thomas to me, gazing upon the Lord with awe; for each moment as he ascended the hill his countenance grew more glorious with a certain Godlike majesty, and shone like the face of Moses descending from Mount Sinai. We all hung back with adoring fear, and alone he proceeded onward, a wide space being left by us between ourselves and him. Yet there was no terror in the glory which surrounded and shone out from him; but rather a holy radiance, that seemed to be the very light of holiness and peace.

"So looked he," said John to us, "when we beheld him transfigured in the mount with Elias and Moses."

The hill, which is not lofty, was soon surmounted by his sacred feet. He stood upon its apex alone. We kept back near the brow of the hill, fearing to approach him, for his raiment shone now like the sun, while his countenance was as lightning. We shaded our eyes to behold him. All was now expectation, and looking for some mighty event—what we knew not! John drew nearest to him, and upon his knees, with clasped hands, looked toward him earnestly; for he knew, 25 he afterward told us, what would take place; Jesus having informed him the night before. Joy and yet tears were a his face, as he gazed with blinded eyes, as one gazes on the noonday sun, upon his Divine Master. It was a scene, dear father, impressive beyond expression. The hilltop was thronged with an expectant, awe-stricken multitude, which knew not whether to remain or fly from the glorious majesty of the presence of the Son of God. The blue sky spread out its illimitable concave above the hills without a cloud. At the foot of the eminence toward the holy city slept the gardens of Gethsemane, where Jesus loved to walk, and where he was arrested. Jerusalem, with its towers, pinnacles, palaces, and gorgeous Temple, glittered in the distance; and Calvary, studded with fresh Roman crosses, stood out boldly in view, in the transparent air. The tall cypresses which grew above the tomb of Joseph, where he had lain, were also visible. Jesus seemed for a moment to survey these scenes of his suffering, of his ignominy and death, with the look of a divine conqueror. He then turned to his disciples and said:

"Ye have been with me in my sorrows, and you now shall behold my glory, and the reward which my Father doth give me. To-day I take leave of you and ascend to my Father and your Father. Remember all things which I have taught you concerning my kingdom. Go forth and teach the glad tidings of salvation to all men, and baptize all nations in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Thus speaking, in a voice that thrilled every bosom with emotions indescribable, he extended his hands above their heads and blessed them, while we all fell upon our faces to the ground, also to receive his blessing.

He then lifted up his eyes to the calm blue depths of heaven, and said:

"And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with Thee before the world was!"

As he spoke, we raised our faces from the ground, and saw him leaving the earth, rising from the hilltop into the air, with a slow and majestic ascension; his hands outspread over us beneath, as if shedding down blessings upon us all. The loud burst of surprise which rose from five hundred voices at seeing him soar away into the atmosphere, was followed by a profound and awful silence, as we watched him rise and still rise, ascending and still ascending into the upper air, his whole form growing brighter and brighter, as the distance widened between his feet and the earth!

Upon our knees, in speechless amazement, we followed his ascent with our eyes, not a word being spoken by any soul; and hearts might have been heard beating in the intense expectation of the moment.

Then in the far off height of heaven, we beheld appear a bright cloud, no larger than a man's hand, but each instant it expanded and grew broader and brighter, and swift as the winged lightning, it descended through the firmament downward, until we beheld it evolve itself into a glittering host of angels, which no man could number, countless as the stars of heaven. As these shining legions descended, they parted into two bands, and sweeping along the air, met the ascending Son of God in the mid sky! The rushing of their ten thousand times ten thousand wings, was heard like the sound of many waters. Surrounding Jesus, like a shining cloud, they received him into their midst, and hid him from our eyes, amid the glories of their celestial splendor.

While we stood gazing up into the far skies, hoping, expecting, yet doubting if we should ever behold him again, two bright stars seemed to be descending from the height of heaven toward us. In a few seconds we saw that they were angels. Alighting on the place Jesus had left, they said to the eleven, "Why gaze ye up into heaven, ye men of Galilee? This same Jesus whom ye have seen go into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have now seen him ascend!" Thus speaking, they vanished out of our sight!

The above account, my dear father, of the ascent yesterday into heaven of the Christ, our Blessed Lord Jesus, I wrote the same evening, while all the circumstances were present and vivid upon my mind. Oh, what a sublime spectacle! What human language can describe it! But one thing I have presented clearly to you, dear father, and that is the fact that Jesus has ascended into the heaven of heavens! Oh, amazing reality! Overwhelming truth! What, oh what is earth?—What is Judea?—What is man?—that God is mindful of him—that He should so have visited him! And when He has visited us—when His Divine Son, the brightness of the glory of the Father, has descended to earth, and assumed our nature, to reconcile us to God, and obtain an eternal life for us, how has he been received? Shunned for his voluntary poverty—despised for his humble human parentage—hated for his holiness—tried before tribunals for crimes unknown to him—scourged and spit upon, mocked and buffeted, and crucified with thieves, as if his enemies would render his death as ignominious as it was capable of being made!

But behold the issue! See, when he had paid the debt of death for us, the change in all things! He awakes to life! He bursts the tomb! He walks forth from the sepulcher! Angels are his servants! After forty days on earth, unfolding to his disciples the mysteries of his gospel and the splendor of his kingdom, he ascends visibly to heaven at midday from Bethany, in the sight of many hundreds, and is escorted by armies of angels to the right hand of the Majesty on high!

Such, my dear father, is the appropriate crowning event of the extraordinary life of Jesus, both Lord and Christ! His ascent from the earth into the heaven of heavens not only is proof that he came from God, but that God is well pleased with all that he has done in the flesh. If in any one thing he taught, he spoke what was not true, either concerning the Father or concerning himself, he would not have received such a welcome back to the heavenly abodes! All that Jesus said of himself is therefore true! Jehovah attests it! We must then believe, or we can have no interest in the kingdom which he has gone to prepare for us, and which we can enter only as he has traveled through it, through humiliation, suffering, death, the tomb, resurrection, and also ascension! Thus did he truly say, "The way I go ye shall know!"

His kingdom is, therefore, my dear father, clearly not of this world, as he said to Pilate, the Procurator; but it is above. To it he has triumphantly ascended, attended by legions of Cherubim and Seraphim, an ascent which David clearly foresaw in vision, when he wrote:

"God has gone up with a shout, he has ascended on High!"
Doubt, then, no longer, dearest father! Jesus, the son of Mary in his human nature, was the Son of God in his Divine nature; an incomprehensible and mysterious union, whereby he has brought together in harmony the two natures, separated far apart by sin, by sacrificing his own body as a sin-offering, to reconcile both in one Immaculate body upon the cross. There is now no more condemnation to them who believe in him and accept him; for in his body he took our sins, and with his precious blood, as that of a lamb without blemish, cleansed them forever away.

But I cannot write all I would say to you, dearest father. When we meet, which you rejoice me in saying, will be on the first day of the week, at Jerusalem, I will unfold to you all that the divine and glorified Jesus has taught me. Doubt not that he is Messias. Hesitate not to accept him; for he is the end of Moses, and of the Law, and of the Prophets, the very Shiloh who should come and restore all things, to whom be glory, power, dominion, majesty, and excellency evermore.

Your loving daughter,

ADINA.

Andrew Jackson

ANDREW JACKSON

[1767-1845]

FREDERICK W. MOORE

ANDREW JACKSON (born March 15, 1767; died June 8, 1845), Major-general in the Regular Army and seventh President of the United States, was a man rather of action than of letters. He was an excellent type of the champion, with all which that can be made to imply of integrity of character, loftiness of purpose, alertness, energy, and effectiveness. He was the defender of justice, the avenger of wrong, not in the abstract, but concretely represented by sinister influence, or individual, or institution. He was better able to destroy the bad than constructively to build up the good. So his apologists have sometimes extolled him too highly and his critics have often disparaged him immoderately. With elements of weakness as patent as the elements of strength, the latter exceeded and the result was a character with definite outlines and force, and with influence on his own generation and ours.

He was a posthumous child, born of a vigorous stock which had not been long enough in this country to have taken root or to overcome poverty. His childhood was spent in a settlement lying across the line dividing the Carolinas, in the edge of the uplands, with Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, and King's Mountain, South Carolina, just beyond. He was only a lad when the Revolution came on; but before its close he had borne arms, suffered imprisonment, and experienced the loss of brothers and mother, who contracted mortal disease while nursing Revolutionary prisoners at Charleston.

Rumor represents that he was a youth of unsettled habits and turbulent disposition; one to whom the adventure and freedom of life across the mountains would be attractive. But we know that he came to the Cumberland settlements bearing a commission as public prosecutor, which even the influence of friends would not have procured for him, we may be sure, without some measure of suitable character and attainments. Certain it is that in the new community he rose to the respons bilities of the position.

He wa? plain and sometimes even uncouth in speech and conduct; rough, blunt, and severe. He was quick to take offence and on some notorious occasions resorted to the methods of the duel and the street brawl to defend his cause. Yet no hostess of high station in life entertained him so elegantly that he did not honor her by the becoming and dignified courtliness of his manner. His chivalry was abundant, spontaneous, and sincere. He could unbend and sympathize with a child. His gentle consideration for a woman was knightly. The tenderness with which he cherished his wife during her life and her memory after her death (Mrs. Rachel Donelson Robards, daughter of Colonel John Donelson, married 1791, died 1828) is a great revelation of a softer side of his nature.

Opportunities which other men would have eagerly seized he quietly let pass. His State was prompt to single him out for advancement to high office, opening for him the door to careers in the national legislature and on the State bench. But he turned from them to take up merchandising, land speculation, stock breeding, and planting. Much more to his liking, as it proved, was the position of Major-general, to which the field officers of the State militia elected him (1803) by a bare majority over John Sevier after a contest involving bitter personalities.

It was the War of 1812 that gave him his great military opportunity; and in military service he displayed some of the most striking traits of his character. His first campaign (1813) was a bloodless expedition to Natchez and back, made memorable because of the esteem in which his soldiers learned to hold him and because he characteristically set aside an order of his superior, the Secretary of War, rather than let his soldiers suffer an injustice-in a matter in which the soundness of his judgment is now generally acknowledged. His second campaign was southward through the Indian country to Mobile. Obstacles were many; difficulty with his troops not the least. Aversion to long campaigns, lack of equipment and discipline, and consequent insubordination were weaknesses which the citizen armies of that period were prone to display. Recruited from the sturdy men of the frontier, they were too self-dependent and democratic to obey orders uncomplainingly and not sometimes "to reason why." Jackson's coolness, courage, and determination in keeping them together, almost in the presence of the foe, was remarkable; but equally so was his discernment that the requirements of Indian campaigning made it imperative that he should do itand the decisive victory of the Horseshoe confirmed his judgment.

His third campaign was for the defence of New Orleans. January 8, 1815, is the date of the victory we celebrate. But the display of Jackson's military genius began a month earlier with the laying of plans to hold the enemy in check while defences were prepared. It was not that the English veterans from the Peninsular failed. It was that their leaders had miscalculated the strategical strength which had been given to the defences and the skill and cool courage of the men behind them. It is futile to point out that the Peace Commissioners had already agreed upon terms and that the slaughter was as useless as it was horrible. In that battle Americans discovered a military hero; and the discovery thrilled them with a timely sense of self-realization which will not soon pass away.

But the circumstances under which the campaign against the Seminoles (1817) was undertaken were such that his genius in Indian warfare could not find free scope without producing serious complications. Receiving his orders, but assuming that the President's silence gave consent to certain alterations which he proposed in them, he quickly put an end to Indian troubles; but by a campaign in which Spanish soil was violated, the rights of English citizens disregarded, and the negotiations with Spain for the purchase of Florida jeopardized. No wonder that such breach of orders and of international law and propriety seemed to call for reprimand. But neither Calhoun in the Cabinet nor Clay in the House could effect it. Jackson's popularity with the masses not only prevented them but it even grew in consequence of their effort.

One surprising sequel developed fourteen years later, when Calhoun was Vice-president and after several of his friends had been accorded seats in the Cabinet. Jackson's sense of honor was keen; and loyalty was with him a matter of honor. Being at length informed that it was Calhoun who had urged the Cabinet to censure him, his anger burned with seven-fold heat. He could not comprehend that a man who had once felt moved to censure him could afterward honorably come into such confidential relations with him. Jackson was so artless that he often failed to conceive the possibility of an honest difference of opinion; and in matters involving ethical judgments, conscious of his own integrity, he judged harshly those who opposed him, none more so than Calhoun and Clay.

The complete abandon with which Jackson committed himself into the hands of his political friends amounted to a trait of character with him. In their efforts (1822) to secure at Washington a delegation from Tennessee favorable to his nomination for the Presidency, he was himself, without intention on his part, elected to the Senate. In the four-cornered Presidential race which followed he received the plurality both of the popular vote and of the electoral college. But Adams was elected by the House and Clay became his Secretary of State. The pure-minded Jackson had forbidden his friends to treat with Clay for his influence and, unable to appreciate that there might be considerations pointing to the propriety of an alliance between Adams and Clay, he saw in it only convincing circumstantial evidence of a bargain. With equal ingenuousness he exalted the expressed preference of a plurality for him into the "will of the people" and, resigning the senatorship, threw himself into a long campaign to recover the Presidency from those who had defeated this "will of the people" by a "corrupt bargain."

St. George was not more active and zealous, and he was scarcely more successful, in fighting the legendary dragon than was Jackson in fighting wrong and injustice and in championing right and justice. A large number of the political problems with which he had to deal could be made to appear in an ethical light. Given a wrong and he was ready to become its avenger; given a just cause in distress and he was ready to seek out the oppressor and make eternal war upon him. He could break down the obstacles impeding the progress of the State, but he had little ability to devise new institutions to put in the place of the discarded ones. He was lacking in the constructive powers of statesmanship. Even in his successes, his weakness was most apparent. Not content with vetoing the bill for the re-charter of the monster bank monopoly, he must needs set about working its immediate undoing by diverting the public funds from its channels -but without having the statesmanship wisely to provide whither they should flow.

He was the soul of western democracy. In his day the spirit of the West was leavening even the East, and the West was peopled with men struggling side by side against great natural obstacles, enduring a common lot, consciously thinking out the economic and political problems of their environment, self-dependent to the limit of their powers, and looking to their neighbors or to the Government for coöperation in the greater common tasks. His democracy was one of initiative. He looked not simply to see that the people were left to enjoy the largest sphere of local self-government in local affairs. as Jefferson did; but to know what they would have their Government do. Within the limits of what it was constitutional for the National Government to undertake, he would have it abdicate its discretion and follow the will of the people. And of this people he was himself a part; their struggles were his struggles; their feelings were his feelings; their aspirations his aspirations. He was their greatest and most typical representative. Strange is the contrast between President Jackson coming out of the pioneer West and the long line of college-bred presidents who preceded him, equipped as each was with years of experience in the National Legislature, in the diplomatic service, and in Cabinet office. But in the view of his generation the contrast was not altogether unfavorable to him.

Busy with doing many things, he was not given to much writing or much speaking. Yet on occasion he could use either vehicle to express himself clearly, tersely, and effectively. There are no volumes of "expositions," "dissertations," and polished orations, such as Calhoun and Webster left. In the compilation of "Messages of the Presidents," published by authority of Congress, his messages fill nearly a volume. Some of his papers, especially those on controverted points, appear in the pages of his biographers. A very large and representative mass of his letters, personal and political, and other manuscripts have within the past few years been acquired by the Library of Congress. Though he bore constant witness in his manner of writing and of speech as well that his childhood was not spent in cultured surroundings and that his youth was not given to the pursuit of the fine arts, there is nothing in either defect for which a biographer need apologize more than he did himself. Occasionally, to a personal friend, he offers excuse for sending off a letter uncopied. But in the transcriptions which he was accustomed to make, as did many other men of the time, the unconventionalities are reduced to a small series of recurring, rather piquant solecisms.

The traits of mind and character and the principles of life which were reflected in his actions are expressed with equal clearness in what he said and wrote. There is the same sympathetic tenderness on occasions that called for it; the same vehemence, force, positiveness, and directness; the same ingenuous artlessness; the same vindication of right; the same arraignment of injustice; the same consciousness of his own integrity; the same conception of the part which the people should have in government. He lived the theories which he subscribed and is the type and idealization of the democracy which bears his name.

A RESPONSE

Reply to the Abbé Dubourg's Address of Welcome.

REVEREND SIR:—I receive with gratitude and pleasure the symbolical crown which piety has prepared; I receive it in the name of the brave men who have so effectually seconded my exertions for the preservation of their country—they well deserve the laurels which their country will bestow.

For myself, to have been instrumental in the deliverance of such a country is the greatest blessing that heaven could confer. That it has been effected with so little loss—that so few tears should cloud the smiles of our triumph, and not a cypress leaf be interwoven in the wreath which you present, is a source of the most exquisite enjoyment.

I thank you, reverend sir, most sincerely for the prayers which you offer up for my happiness. May those your patriotism dictates for our beloved country be first heard. And may mine for your individual prosperity, as well as that of the congregation committed to your care, be favorably received—the prosperity, the wealth, the happiness of this city will then be commensurate with the courage and other qualities of its inhabitants.

ADDRESS TO THE MILITIA

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-SOLDIERS:—The President's proclamation, as well as the Secretary of War's letter to me, dated on the nineteenth of last month, has given rise to the preparatory steps taken to have the militia under my command in complete readiness. Those communications sound the tocsin of alarm. They are sufficient evidence to us that the repose of our country is about to be interrupted; that an illegal enterprise has been set on foot by disappointed, unprincipled, ambitious or misguided individuals; and that they are about to be carried on against the government of Spain, contrary to the faith of treaties. Other reports state that the adventurers in this enterprise were numerous; that they had assembled at the mouth of Cumberland River, in considerable force and hostile array; that they had for their objects a separation of the western from the eastern part of the United States; and that an attack would, in the first place, be made on New Orleans.

These things, my fellow-soldiers, gave rise to my orders of the second instant, to the end that twelve companies of volunteer corps might be prepared to march on the fifth. I did at the same time order Brigadier-general James Winchester to take the command. As a previous and necessary measure to any order to march, I dispatched a confidential express to the mouth of Cumberland River and to Massac, with a letter to Captain Bissell, the commanding officer at that place. express returned on the eighth instant, from whose report, together with the information given by Captain Bissell, we are furnished with the very pleasing news that nothing in that quarter is the least alarming. The alluded to address from the commanding officer had been read to you on parade. Under all these circumstances, added to the limited point of view which the orders given me must be interpreted. I have deemed proper to dismiss the corps under my command, and direct them to return to their respective homes until their country shall require their services, and until further orders shall be given. The appearance of unanimity, the ardor displayed on this occasion, and the promptness with which both the officers and men have attended to their duty and orders, are sure pledges to their country and to their General, that when emergency shall require, they will fly with the wings of Patriotism to support the united government of their country, and the liberty it so bountifully affords. He also clearly sees the great physical strength of our country displayed much to his satisfaction, in the promptness and alacrity with which General Winchester, General Johnston and the officers and men now in view, have shown in their attention to his orders. Here is the bulwark of our country always sufficient to support and defend the constituted authorities of our Government. When the insolence or vanity of the Spanish Government shall dare to repeat their insults on our flag, or shall dare to violate the sacred obligations of the good faith of our treaties with them; or should the disorganizing TRAITOR attempt the dismemberment of our country or criminal breach of our laws, let me ask what will be the effects of the example given by a tender of service made by such men as compose the Invincible Grays, commanded, too. It must and will produce effects like these: the youthful patriot will be invigorated to a proper sense of duty and zeal, and the vengeance of an insulted country will burst upon the devoted heads of any foreign invaders, or the authors of such diabolical plans. When we behold aged, deserving and respectable men, whom the laws of their country exempt from common military duty, the very first to come forward in the event of danger, and whose situation is every how comfortable at home, thus to act, what must be the degree of feeling and sensibility excited? It is beyond comprehension, but merits the highest encomium.

Friends and fellow-soldiers, I cannot dismiss you without making honorable mention of the patriotism of Captain Thomas Williamson, displayed on the present occasion, who, in twenty-four hours after the receipt of my letter, notified me that he was ready to march at the head of a full company of volunteers. Such promptness as this will be a fit example for the hardy sons of freedom, should the constituted authorities require our service.

Return, fellow-soldiers, to the bosom of your families, with the best wishes of your General, until your country calls, and then it is expected that you will march on a moment's warning.

FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

March 24, 1829.

Fellow-Citizens:—About to undertake the arduous duties that I have been appointed to perform by the choice of a free people, I avail myself of this customary and solemn occasion to express the gratitude which their confidence inspires and to acknowledge the accountability which my situation enjoins. While the magnitude of their interests convinces me that no thanks can be adequate to the honor they have conferred, it admonishes me that the best return I can make is the zealous dedication of my humble abilities to their service and their good.

As the instrument of the Federal Constitution it will devolve on me for a stated period to execute the laws of the United States, to superintend their foreign and their confederate relations, to manage their revenue, to command their forces, and, by communications to the Legislature, to watch over and to promote their interests generally. And the principles of action by which I shall endeavor to accomplish this circle of duties it is now proper for me briefly to explain.

In administering the laws of Congress I shall keep steadily in view the limitations as well as the extent of the Executive power, trusting thereby to discharge the functions of my office without transcending its authority. With foreign nations it will be my study to preserve peace and to cultivate friendship on fair and honorable terms, and in the adjustment of any difference that may exist or arise to exhibit the forbearance becoming a powerful nation rather than the sensibility belonging to a gallant people.

In such measures as I may be called on to pursue in regard to the rights of the separate States I hope to be animated by a proper respect for those sovereign members of our Union, taking care not to confound the powers they have reserved to themselves with those they have granted to the Confederacy.

The management of the public revenue—that searching operation in all governments—is among the most delicate and important trusts in ours, and it will, of course, demand no inconsiderable share of my official solicitude. Under every aspect in which it can be considered it would appear that advantage must result from the observance of a strict and faithful economy. This I shall aim at the more anxiously both because it will facilitate the extinguishment of the national debt, the unnecessary duration of which is incompatible with real independence, and because it will counteract that tendency to public and private profligacy which a profuse expenditure of money by the Government is but too apt to engender. Powerful auxiliaries to the attainment of this desirable end are to be found in the regulations provided by the wisdom of Congress for the specific appropriation of public money and the prompt accountability of public officers.

With regard to a proper selection of the subjects of impost with a view to revenue, it would seem to me that the spirit of equity, caution, and compromise in which the Constitution was formed requires that the great interests of agriculture, commerce and manufactures should be equally favored, and that perhaps the only exception to this rule should consist in the peculiar encouragement of any products of either of them that may be found essential to our national independence.

Internal improvement and the diffusion of knowledge, so far as they can be promoted by the constitutional acts of the Federal Government, are of high importance.

Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power. The gradual increase of our Navy, whose flag has displayed in distant climes, our skill in navigation and our fame in arms; the preservation of our forts, arsenals, and dockyards, and the introduction of progressive improvements in the discipline and science of both branches of our military service are so plainly prescribed by prudence that I should be excused for omitting their mention sooner than for enlarging on their importance. But the bulwark of our defence is the national militia, which in the present state of our intelligence and population must render us invincible. As long as our Government is administered for the good of the people, and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and of property, liberty of conscience and of the press, it will be worth defending; and so long as it is worth defending a patriotic militia will cover it with an impenetrable ægis. Partial injuries and occasional mortifications we may be subjected to, but a million of armed freemen, possessed of the means of war, can never be conquered by a foreign foe. To any just system, therefore, calculated to strengthen this natural safeguard of the country I shall cheerfully lend all the aid in my power.

It will be my sincere and constant desire to observe toward the Indian tribes within our limits a just and liberal policy, and to give that humane and considerate attention to their rights and their wants which is consistent with the habits of our Government and the feelings of our people.

The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform, which will require particularly the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands.

In the performance of a task thus generally delineated I shall endeavor to select men whose diligence and talents will insure in their respective stations able and faithful coöperation, depending for the advancement of the public service more on the integrity and zeal of the public officers than on their numbers.

A diffidence, perhaps too just, in my own qualifications will teach me to look with reverence to the examples of public virtue left by my illustrious predecessors, and with veneration to the lights that flow from the mind that founded and the mind that reformed our system. The same diffidence induces me to hope for instruction and aid from the coördinate branches of the Government, and for the indulgence and support of my fellow-citizens generally. And a firm reliance on the goodness of that power whose providence mercifully protected our national infancy, and has since upheld our liberties in various vicissitudes, encourages me to offer up my ardent supplications that He will continue to make our beloved country the object of His divine care and gracious benediction.

THE PRESIDENT TO MR. VAN BUREN

From 'Life of Andrew Jackson,' by James Parton.

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1831.

DEAR SIR:—Your letter resigning the office of Secretary of State was received last evening. I could indeed wish that no circumstances had arisen to interrupt the relations which have, for two years, subsisted between us, and that they might have continued through the period during which it may be my lot to remain charged with the duties which the partiality of my countrymen has imposed upon me. But the reasons you present are so strong that, with a proper regard for them, I cannot ask you, on my own account, to remain in the Cabinet.

I am aware of the difficulties you have had to contend with, and of the benefits which have resulted to the affairs of your country, from your continuous zeal in the arduous tasks to which you have been subjected. To say that I deeply regret to lose you, is but feebly to express my feelings on the occasion.

When called by my country to the station which I occupy, it was not without a deep sense of its arduous responsibilities, and a strong distrust of myself, that I obeyed the call; but cheered by the consciousness that no other motive actuated me than a desire to guard her interests, and to place her upon the firm ground of those great principles which, by the wisest and purest of our patriots, have been deemed essential to her prosperity, I ventured upon the trust assigned me. I did this in the confident hope of finding the support of advisers able and true; who, laying aside everything but a desire to give new vigor to the vital principles of our Union, would look with a single eye to the best means of effecting this paramount object. In you, this hope has been realized to the utmost. In the most difficult and trying moments of my administration, I have always found you sincere, able, and efficient-anxious at all times to afford me every aid.

If, however, from circumstances in your judgment sufficient to make it necessary, the official ties subsisting between us must be severed, I can only say that this necessity is deeply lamented by me. I part with you only because you yourself have requested me to do so, and have sustained that request by reasons strong enough to command my assent. I cannot, however, allow the separation to take place, without expressing the hope that this retirement from public affairs is but temporary; and that if in any other station the Government should have occasion for your services, the value of which has been so sensibly felt by me, your consent will not be wanting.

Of the state of things to which you advert, I cannot but be fully aware. I look upon it with sorrow, and regret the more, because one of its first effects is to disturb the harmony of my Cabinet. It is, however, but an instance of one of the evils to which free governments must ever be liable. The only remedy for these evils, as they arise, lies in the intelligence and public spirit of our common constituents. They will correct them—and in this there is abundant consolation. I cannot quit this subject without adding that, with the best opportunities for observing and judging, I have seen in you no other desire than to move quietly on in the path of your duties, and to promote the harmonious conduct of public affairs. If, on this point, you have had to encounter detraction, it is but another proof of the utter insufficiency of innocence and worth to shield from such assaults.

Be assured that the interest you express in my happiness is most heartily reciprocated—that my most cordial feelings accompany you, and that I am, very sincerely, your friend,

ANDREW JACKSON.

PRESERVATION OF THE UNION

Extract from a Proclamation issued December 10, 1832.

THIS, then, is the position in which we stand: A small majority of the citizens of one State in the Union have elected delegates to a State convention; that convention has ordained that all the revenue laws of the United States must be repealed, or that they are no longer a member of the Union. The Governor of that State has recommended to the Legislature the raising of an army to carry the secession into effect, and that he may be empowered to give clearances to vessels in the name of the State. No act of violent opposition to the laws has yet been committed, but such a state of things is hourly apprehended. And it is the intent of this instrument to proclaim, not only that the duty imposed on me by the Constitution "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed" shall be performed to the extent of the powers already vested in me by law, or as such others as the wisdom of Congress shall devise and intrust to me for that purpose, but to warn the citizens of South Carolina who have been deluded into an opposition to the laws of the danger they will incur by the obedience to the illegal and disorganizing ordinance of the convention; to exhort those who have refused to support it to persevere in their determination to uphold the Constitution and laws of their country; and to point out to all the perilous situation into which the good people of that State have been led, and that the course they are urged to pursue is one of ruin and disgrace to the very State whose rights they affect to support.

Fellow-citizens of my native State, let me not only admonish you as the First Magistrate of our common country, not to incur the penalty of its laws, but use the influence that a father would over his children whom he saw rushing to certain ruin. In that paternal language, with that paternal feeling, let me tell you, my countrymen, that you are deluded by men who are either deceived themselves or wish to deceive you. Mark under what pretences you have been led on to the brink of insurrection and treason on which you stand. First, a diminution of the value of your staple commodity, lowered by overproduction in other quarters, and the consequent diminution in the value of your lands were the sole effect of the tariff laws. effect of those laws was confessedly injurious, but the evil was greatly exaggerated by the unfounded theory you were taught to believe—that its burthens were in proportion to your exports, not to your consumption of imported articles. Your pride was roused by the assertion that a submission to those laws was a state of vassalage and that resistance to them was equal in patriotic merit to the opposition our fathers offered to the oppressive laws of Great Britain. You were told that this opposition might be peaceably, might be constitutionally. made; that you might enjoy all the advantages of the Union and bear none of its burthens. Eloquent appeals to your passions, to your State pride, to your native courage, to your sense of real injury, were used to prepare you for the period when the mask which concealed the hideous features of disunion should be taken off. It fell, and you were made to look with complacency on objects which not long since you would have regarded with horror. Look back to the arts which have brought you to this state; look forward to the consequences to which it must inevitably lead! Look back to what was first told you as an inducement to enter into this dangerous course. The great political truth was repeated to you that you had the revolutionary right of resisting all laws that were palpably unconstitutional and intolerably oppressive. It was added that the right to nullify a law rested on the same principle, but that it was a peaceable remedy. This character which was given to it made you receive with too much confidence the assertions that were made of the unconstitutionality of the law and its oppressive effects. Mark, my fellow-citizens, that by the admission of your leaders the unconstitutionality must be palpable, or it will not justify either resistance or nullification. What is the meaning of the word palpable in the sense in which it is here used? That which is apparent to everyone; that which no man of ordinary intellect will fail to perceive. Is the unconstitutionality of these laws of that description? Let those among your leaders who once approved and advocated the principle of protective duties answer the question; and let them choose whether they will be considered as incapable then of perceiving that which must have been apparent to every man of common understanding, or as imposing upon your confidence and endeavoring to mislead you now. In either case they are unsafe guides in the perilous path they urge you to tread. Ponder well on this circumstance, and you will know how to appreciate the exaggerated language they address to you. They are not champions of liberty, emulating the fame of our Revolutionary fathers, nor are you an oppressed people, contending, as they repeat to you, against worse than Colonial vassalage. You are free members of a flourishing and happy Union. There is no settled design to oppress you. You have indeed felt the unequal operation of laws which may have been unwisely, not unconstitutionally, passed; but that inequality must necessarily be removed. At the very moment when you were madly urged on to the unfortunate course you have begun a change in public opinion had commenced. The nearly approaching payment of the public debt and the consequent necessity of a diminution of duties had already produced a considerable reduction, and that, too, on some articles of general consumption in your State. The importance of this change was underrated, and you were authoritatively told that no further alleviation of your burthens was to be expected at the very time when the condition of the country imperiously demanded such a modification of the duties as should reduce them to a just and equitable scale. But, as if apprehensive of the effect of this change in allaying your discontents, you were precipitated into the fearful state in which you now find yourselves.

I have urged you to look back to the means that were used to hurry you on to the position you have now assumed and forward to the consequences it will produce. Something more is necessary. Contemplate the condition of that country of which you still form an important part. Consider its Government, uniting in one bond of common interest and general protection so many different States, giving to all their inhabitants the proud title of American citisen, protecting their commerce, securing their literature and their arts, facilitating their intercommunication, defending their frontiers, and making their name respected in the remotest parts of the earth. Consider the extent of its territory, its increasing and happy population, its advance in arts which render life agreeable, and the sciences which elevate the mind! See education spreading the lights of religion, morality, and general information into every cottage in this wide extent of our Territories and States. Behold it as the asylum where the wretched and the oppressed find a refuge and support. Look on this picture of happiness and honor and say, We too are citizens of America. Carolina is one of these proud States; her arms have defended, her best blood has cemented, this happy Union. And then add, if you can, without horror and remorse, This happy Union we will dissolve; this picture of peace and prosperity we will deface; this free intercourse we will interrupt; these fertile fields we will deluge with blood; the protection of that glorious flag we renounce; the very name of Americans we discard. And for what, mistaken men? For what do you throw away these inestimable blessings? For what would you exchange your share in the advantages and honor of the Union? For the dream of a separate independence—a dream interrupted by bloody conflicts with your neighbors and a vile dependence on a foreign power. If your leaders could succeed in establishing a separation, what would be your situation? Are you united at home? Are you free from the apprehension of civil discord, with all its fearful consequences? Do our neighboring republics, every day suffering some new revolution or contending with some new insurrection, do they excite your envy? But the dictates of a high duty oblige me solemnly to announce that you cannot succeed. The laws of the United States must be executed. I have no discretionary power on the subject; my duty is emphatically pronounced in the Constitution. Those who told you that you might peaceably prevent their execution deceived you; they could not have been deceived themselves. They know that a forcible opposition could alone prevent the execution of the laws, and they know that such opposition must be repelled. Their object is disunion. But be not deceived by names. Disunion by armed force is treason. Are you really ready to incur its guilt? If you are, on the heads of the instigators of the act be the dreadful consequences; on their heads be the dishonor, but on yours may fall the punishment. On your unhappy State will inevitably fall all the evils of the conflict you force upon the Government of your country. It cannot accede to the mad project of disunion, of which you would be the first victims. Its First Magistrate cannot, if he would, avoid the performance of his duty. The consequence must be fearful for you, distressing to your fellow-citizens here and to the friends of good government throughout the world. Its enemies have beheld our prosperity with a vexation they could not conceal: it was a standing refutation of their slavish doctrines, and they will point to our discord with the triumph of malignant joy. It is yet in your power to disappoint them. There is yet time to show that the descendants of the Pinckneys, the Sumters, the Rutledges, and of the thousand other names which adorn the pages of your Revolutionary history will not abandon that Union to support which so many of them fought and bled and died. I adjure you, as you honor their memory, as you love the cause of freedom, to which they dedicated their lives, as you prize the peace of your country, the lives of its best citizens, and your own fair fame, to retrace your steps. Snatch from the archives of your State the disorganizing edict of its convention; bid its members to reassemble and promulgate the decided expressions of your will to remain in the path which alone can conduct you to safety, prosperity. and honor. Tell them that compared to disunion all other evils are light, because that brings with it an accumulation of all. Declare that you will never take the field unless the star-spangled banner of your country shall float over you; that you will not be stigmatized when dead, and dishonored and scorned while you live, as the authors of the first attack on the Constitution of your country. Its destroyers you cannot be. You may disturb its peace, you may interrupt the course of its prosperity, you may cloud its reputation for stability; but its tranquillity will be restored, its prosperity will return, and the stain upon its national character will be transferred and remain an eternal blot on the memory of those who caused the disorder.

Fellow-citizens of the United States, the threat of unhallowed disunion, the names of those once respected by whom it is uttered, the array of military force to support it, denote the approach of a crisis in our affairs on which the continuance of our unexampled prosperity, our political existence, and perhaps that of all free governments may depend. The conjuncture demanded a free, a full, and explicit enunciation, not only of my intentions, but of my principles of action; and as the claim was asserted of a right by a State to annul the laws of the Union, and even to secede from it at pleasure, a frank exposition of my opinions in relation to the origin and form of our Government and the construction I give to the instrument of which it was created seemed to be proper. Having the fullest confidence in the justness of the legal and constitutional opinion of my duties which has been expressed, I rely with equal confidence on your undivided support in my determination to execute the laws, to preserve the Union by all constitutional means, to arrest, if possible, by moderate and firm measures the necessity of a recourse to force; and if it be the will of Heaven that the recurrence of its primeval curse on man for the shedding of a brother's blood should fall upon our land, that it be not called down by any offensive act on the part of the United States.

Fellow-citizens, the momentous case is before you. On your undivided support of your Government depends the decision of the great question it involves—whether your sacred Union will be preserved and the blessing it secures to us as one people shall be perpetuated. No one can doubt that the unanimity with which that decision will be expressed will be such as to inspire new confidence in republican institutions, and that the prudence, the wisdom, and the courage which it will bring to their defence will transmit them unimpaired and invigorated to our children.

May the Great Ruler of Nations grant that the signal blessings with which He has favored ours may not, by the madness of party or personal ambition, be disregarded and lost; and may His wise providence bring those who have produced this crisis to see the folly before they feel the misery of civil strife, and inspire a returning veneration for that Union which, if we may dare to penetrate His designs, He has chosen as the only means of attaining the high destinies to which we may reasonably aspire.

EXTRACTS FROM FAREWELL ADDRESS

March 4, 1837.

FELLOW-CITIZENS:—Being about to retire finally from public life, I beg leave to offer you my grateful thanks for the many proofs of kindness and confidence which I have received at your hands. It has been my fortune in the discharge of public duties, civil and military, frequently to have found myself in difficult and trying situations, where prompt decision and energetic action were necessary, and where the interest of the country required that high responsibilities should be fearlessly encountered; and it is with the deepest emotions of gratitude that I acknowledge the continued and unbroken confidence with which you have sustained me in every trial. My public life has been a long one, and I cannot hope that it has at all times been free from errors; but I have the consolation of knowing that if mistakes have been committed they have not seriously injured the country I so anxiously endeavored to serve, and at the moment when I surrender my last public trust I leave this great people prosperous and happy, in the full enjoyment of liberty and peace, and honored and respected by every nation of the world.

If my humble efforts have in any degree contributed to preserve to you these blessings, I have been more than rewarded by the honors you have heaped upon me, and, above all, by the generous confidence with which you have supported me in every peril, and with which you have continued to animate and cheer my path to the closing hour of my political life. The time has now come when advanced age and a broken frame warn me to retire from public concerns, but the recollection of the many favors you have bestowed upon me is engraven upon my heart, and I have felt that I could not part from your service without making this public acknowledgment of the gratitude I owe you. And if I use the occasion to offer to you the counsels of age and experience, you will, I trust, receive them with the same indulgent kindness which you have so often extended to me, and will at least see in them an earnest desire to perpetuate in this favored land the blessings of liberty and equal law.

While I am thus endeavoring to press upon your attention the principles which I deem of vital importance in the domestic concerns of the country, I ought not to pass over without notice the important considerations which should govern your policy toward foreign powers. It is unquestionably our true interest to cultivate the most friendly understanding with every nation and to avoid by every honorable means the calamities of war. and we shall best attain this object by frankness and sincerity in our foreign intercourse, by the prompt and faithful execution of treaties, and by justice and impartiality in our conduct to all. But no nation, however desirous of peace, can hope to escape occasional collisions with other powers, and the soundest dictates of policy require that we should place ourselves in a condition to assert our rights if a resort to force should ever become necessary. Our local situation, our long line of seacoast, indented by numerous bays, with deep rivers opening into the interior, as well as our extended and still increasing commerce, point to the Navy as our natural means of defence. It will in the end be found to be the cheapest and most effectual, and now is the time, in a season of peace and with an overflowing revenue, that we can year after year add to its strength without increasing the burthens of the people. It is your true policy, for your Navy will not only protect your rich and flourishing commerce in distant seas, but will enable to reach and annoy the enemy and will give to defence its greatest efficiency by meeting danger at a distance from home. It is impossible by any line of fortifications to guard every point from attack against a hostile force advancing from the ocean and selecting its object, but they are indispensable to protect cities from bombardment, dockyards and naval arsenals from destruction, to give shelter to merchant vessels in time of war and to single ships or weaker squadrons when pressed by superior force. Fortifications of this description cannot be too soon completed and armed and placed in a condition of the most perfect preparation. The abundant means we now possess cannot be applied in any manner more useful to the country, and when this is done and our naval force sufficiently strengthened and our militia armed we need not fear that any nation will wantonly insult us or needlessly provoke hostilities. We shall more certainly preserve peace when it is well understood that we are prepared for war.

In presenting to you, my fellow-citizens, these parting counsels, I have brought before you the leading principles upon which I endeavored to administer the Government in the high office with which you twice honored me. Knowing that the path of freedom is continually beset by enemies who often assume the disguise of friends, I have devoted the last hours of my public life to warn you of the dangers. The progress of the United States under our free and happy institutions has surpassed the most sanguine hope of the founders of the Republic. Our growth has been rapid beyond all former example in numbers, in wealth, in knowledge, and all the useful arts which contribute to the comforts and convenience of man, and from the earliest ages of history to the present day there never have been thirteen millions of people associated in one political body who enjoyed so much freedom and happiness as the people of these United States. You have no longer any cause to fear danger from abroad; your strength and power are well known throughout the civilized world, as well as the high and gallant bearing of your sons. It is from within, among yourselves-from cupidity, from corruption, from disappointed ambition and inordinate thirst for power—that factions will be formed and liberty endangered. It is against such designs, whatever disguise the actors may assume, that you have especially to guard yourselves. You have the highest of human trusts committed to your care. Providence has showered on this favored land blessings without number, and has chosen you as the guardians of freedom, to preserve it for the benefit of the human race. May He who holds in His hands the destinies of nations make you worthy of the favors He has bestowed and enable you, with pure hearts and pure hands and sleepless vigilance, to guard and defend to the end of time the great charge He has committed to your keeping.

My own race is nearly run; advanced age and failing health warn me that before long I must pass beyond the reach of human events and cease to feel the vicissitudes of human affairs. I thank God that my life has been spent in a land of liberty and that He has given me a heart to love my country with the affection of a son. And filled with gratitude for your constant and unwavering kindness, I bid you a last and affectionate farewell.

HENRY ROOTES JACKSON

[1820-1898]

J. H. T. MCPHERSON

In 1772 a sturdy Devonshire lad of fifteen, moved by alluring reports from one of his father's friends who had won position and success in the New World, left his native village of Moreton, Hampstead, to find a home and a career in America. He settled in Savannah, studied law, and on the outbreak of the Revolution became an ardent patriot. This was James Jackson, one of the most striking figures of the early annals of Georgia. Active in affairs of war and peace, he won the rank of brigadier-general in the provincial army at the age of twenty-one, took part in the first Georgia Constitutional Convention, and represented his State in the first Federal Congress, later rising to the positions of Governor and Senator.

In 1790 he brought over from the Devonshire home a younger brother, Henry Jackson, then a boy twelve years of age, whom he adopted and cared for as a son. Henry was educated in Savannah, was graduated in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania and in course of time became professor of physics and chemistry in the University of Georgia, a position which he held, with some intermissions, from 1811 to 1827. When William H. Crawford was Minister to France, Jackson was appointed his Secretary of Legation, and upon his return to accept a position in the Cabinet served for a year, 1815-1816, as chargé d'affaires. He married in 1819 Martha Jacqueline Rootes Cobb, the daughter of Thomas Reade Rootes of Fredericksburg, Virginia, who had come to Georgia six years before as the young bride of Captain Howell Cobb, and was now in the first year of her widowhood.

Henry Rootes Jackson, born at Athens on June 24, 1820, was the son of this marriage. He received his early education in Athens, attended the University of Georgia, and later the College of New Jersey and Yale, whence he was graduated in 1839. The following year he was admitted to the Georgia Bar, and began practice in Savannah. In 1843 President Tyler appointed him United States District Attorney for Georgia. He early displayed qualities of leadership, and on the declaration of war with Mexico was made captain of the "Irish Jasper Greens" and led them from Savannah, later becoming colonel of the only regiment that went to the war from Georgia. A number of his poems were written in camp during this campaign. After the war he edited a paper, the Georgian, in Savannah, for a time, and from 1850 to 1853 served as judge of the Superior Court of the Eastern circuit.

In 1853 he received appointment as chargé d'affaires at Vienna and the following year was made Resident Minister to Austria, a post which he ably filled until July, 1858. On his return to America he was retained by the Federal Government to assist the District Attorney in the prosecution of certain violators of the laws forbidding the African slave trade, particularly those connected with the operations of the notorious slave yacht, the Wanderer. This task, in which he displayed great energy for several years, winning a reputation for high forensic ability, involved in those days no small degree of public odium, and proved a test of the courage and keen sense of duty which form the keynote of his character. His connection with these trials made him unpopular for a time, and greatly diminished his law practice; but in the end it redounded to his credit. During this period he was offered the chancellorship of the University of Georgia, on the resignation of Dr. Alonzo Church. He submitted a scheme of education, the main idea of which was to make the University a State military institution, whose graduates should be commissioned as second lieutenants of Georgia volunteers, to be called into service when emergency required. The plan was not approved, and he declined the appointment.

On the eve of the war between the States he threw himself vigorously into the political agitation as a champion of Southern principles, and made many forcible speeches and addresses. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention which met at Charleston April 23 and at Richmond June 21, 1860. On the withdrawal of Georgia from the Union he was appointed by Governor Brown major-general of the State forces, and later served as a judge of the Confederate courts. He joined the Confederate Army in 1861, served against McClellan in West Virginia, and on July thirteenth succeeded to the command of General R. S. Garnett, who was killed at Carrick's Ford on that date. This brilliant beginning was soon clouded. Governor Brown offered him command of a division of Georgia troops, and, anxious to serve with the men of his native State, he applied for leave of absence from the regular army. This was refused, and to attain his end he resigned his commission, a step by which he incurred the disfavor of the Administration. Jackson had scarcely brought his division into perfect shape when the Conscript Law went into effect, and Governor Brown, in order not to waste the efforts spent on the organization. turned over the command intact to the Confederate authorities. General Jackson resigned, as a formal step of the transfer, but expected reappointment by President Davis. The recommendation of the Governor was coldly received by the Administration, nor did repeated attempts of the Georgia delegation at Richmond to secure another command for Jackson meet with better results. For three years he was kept out of honorable military employment. In 1864, however, he served under Hood in the Atlanta campaign, and commanded a brigade of the Army of Tennessee in the battles of Franklin and Nashville. At Nashville he was taken prisoner, with his whole division, and was detained, first at Johnston's Island and then at Fort Warren, until the end of the war.

Returning to Savannah, he resumed the practice of the law and built up a highly successful and lucrative practice, acquiring wealth and fame and rising to foremost distinction in the State. His professional renown was rivaled by his reputation for high principle, dauntless courage, warm emotions, social charm, and interest in art and letters. In 1885 President Cleveland appointed him Minister to Mexico, where he acquired new laurels, which were not lessened by the disagreement with Bayard over the Cutting affair and his consequent resignation. He held many offices of trust; among others he was trustee of the University of Georgia, from which he received the honorary degrees of A.M. and LL.D.; trustee of the Peabody Fund, president of the Georgia Historical Society, president of the Telfair Art Academy, and director of the Central Railroad Company.

He was twice married, in 1843 to Miss Cornelia Augusta Davenport of Savannah, who died in 1853, and in 1866 to Miss Florence King of St. Simon's Island. There were four children by the first marriage, of whom two, a son and a daughter, survive him. He died of paralysis in Savannah, on May 23, 1898.

Jurist, statesman, soldier, diplomatist, General Jackson in his later years esteemed but lightly the little volume of verse published in 1850, entitled 'Tallulah and Other Poems.' Indeed, he is said to have made strenuous and fairly successful efforts to buy up and destroy the edition. Yet many of the verses possess decided charm and literary merit; and one in particular—"The Red Old Hills of Georgia"—went to the heart of the people of his State in a way that will cause it to be remembered long after his substantial services are forgotten.

THE RED OLD HILLS OF GEORGIA

The red old hills of Georgia!
So bald, and bare, and bleak—
Their memory fills my spirit
With thoughts I cannot speak.
They have no robe of verdure,
Stript naked to the blast;
And yet, of all the varied earth,
I love them best at last.

I love them for the pleasure
With which my life was blest,
When erst I left in boyhood
My footsteps on their breast.
When in the rains had perished
Those steps from plain and knoll,
Then vanished, with the storm of grief,
Joy's footprints from my soul!

The red old hills of Georgia!

My heart is on them now;

Where, fed from golden streamlets,

Oconee's waters flow!

I love them with devotion,

Though washed so bleak and bare—

Oh! can my spirit e'er forget

The warm hearts dwelling there?

I love them for the living—
The generous, kind, and gay;
And for the dead who slumber
Within their breasts of clay.
I love them for the bounty
Which cheers the social hearth;
I love them for their rosy girls—
The fairest on the earth!

The red old hills of Georgia!

Oh! where upon the face
Of earth is freedom's spirit

More bright in any race?
In Switzerland and Scotland

Each patriot breast it fills,
But oh! it blazes brighter yet

Among our Georgia hills!

And where, upon their surface,
Is heart to feeling dead?
Oh! when has needy stranger
Gone from those hills unfed?
There bravery and kindness
For aye go hand in hand,
Upon your washed and naked hills,
My own, my native land!

The red old hills of Georgia
I never can forget;
Amid life's joys and sorrows,
My heart is on them yet;
And when my course is ended—
No more to toil or rove,
May I be held in their dear clasp
Close, close to them I love!

MY FATHER

As die the embers on the hearth,
And o'er the floor the shadows fall,
And creeps the chirping cricket forth,
And ticks the death-watch in the wall,
I see a form in yonder chair
That grows beneath the waning light;
There are the wan, sad features—there
The pallid brow and locks of white.

My Father! when they laid thee down,
And heaped the clay upon thy breast,
And left thee sleeping all alone
Upon thy narrow couch of rest,
I know not why I could not weep,
The soothing drops refused to roll,
And oh! that grief is wild and deep
Which settles on the tearless soul!

But when I saw thy vacant chair,

Thine idle hat upon the wall,

Thy book—the penciled passage where Thine eye had rested last of all—

The tree beneath whose friendly shade

Thy trembling feet had wandered forth—

The very prints those feet had made

When last they feebly trod the earth—

And thought, while countless ages fled,
Thy vacant seat would vacant stand—
Unworn thy hat—thy book unread—
Effaced thy footsteps from the sand—
And widowed in this cheerless world
The heart that gave its love to thee—
Torn like the vine whose tendrils curled
More closely round the falling tree—

Oh! Father! then for her and thee
Gushed madly forth the scorching tears;
And oft, and long, and bitterly,
Those tears have gushed in later years;
For as the world grows cold around,
And things take on their real hue,
'Tis sad to learn that love is found
Alone above the stars with you!

MY WIFE AND CHILD

The tattoo beats; the lights are gone;
The camp around in slumber lies;
The night with solemn pace moves on;
The shadows thicken o'er the skies;
But sleep my weary eyes hath flown,
And sad, uneasy thoughts arise.

I think of thee, oh! dearest one!
Whose love my early life hath blest;
Of thee and him—our baby son—
Who slumbers on thy gentle breast;
God of the tender, frail and lone,
Oh! guard that little sleeper's rest!

Wherever fate those forms may throw,
Loved with a passion almost wild—
By day, by night—in joy or woe—
By fears oppressed, or hopes beguiled—
From every danger, every foe,
O God! protect my wife and child!

OCONEE

Oconee! in my tranquil slumbers,
At the silent dead of night,
Oft I see thy golden waters
Flashing in the rosy light—
And flashing brightly, gushing river,
On the spirit of my dream,
As in moments fled forever,
When I wandered by thy stream.

* * * * * *

And there I lay in pleasant slumber,
And the rushing of thy stream
Ever made a gentle music,
Blending softly with my dream—
My dream of her who near thy waters
Grew beneath my loving eye,
Fairest maid of Georgia's daughters,
Sweetest flower beneath her sky!

With snowy brow and golden ringlets,
Eyes that beggared heaven's blue,
Voice as soft as summer's streamlets,
Lips as fresh as morning's dew!
Although she played me oft the coquette,
Dealing frowns and glances shy,
These but made her smiles the dearer
To a rover such as I.

What if earth by fairer river

Nursed more beauteous maid than she—
He had found a slow believer

Who had told that tale to me!

And sure I am no knighted lover

Truer faith to ladye bore,

Than the little barefoot rover,

Dreaming on thy pleasant shore.

The happiest hours of life are vanished;
She has vanished with them too!
Other bright-eyed Georgia damsels
Blossom where my lily grew;
And yet the proudest and the sweetest
To my heart can never seem Lovely as the little Peri,
Mouldering by thy murmuring stream!

THE MOUNTAINS IN GEORGIA

Ye glorious Alleghanies! from this height
I see your peaks on every side arise;
Their summits roll beneath the giddy sight,
Like ocean billows heaved among the skies.
In wild magnificence upon them lies
The primal forest—kindling in the glow
Of this mild autumn sun with golden dyes,
While, in his slanting ray, their shadows grow
Broad o'er the paradise of vale and wood below.

How beautiful! though, fresh from Nature's God, They show no footstep of an elder race; No human hand has ever turned their sod, Or heaved their massive granite from its place; The green banks of their floods bear not a trace Of pomp and power, which have come and gone, And left their crumbling ruins to deface The virgin earth. Here Nature rules alone; The beauty of the hill and valley is her own.

Nor might the future generations know
Aught of the simple people who have made
Their habitations by the streams that flow
So fresh and stainless from the forest shade,
Who built their council fires on hill and glade,
And in yon pleasant valleys, by the fall
Of crystal founts, perchance, their dead have laid;
But for the names of mountain, river, cataract—all Significant of thought and sweetly musical.

A GEORGIA NIGHT

The dreamy midnight rests upon the scene;
The gentle moon in heaven hangs serene,
And sheds her light o'er groves where infant spring
Is working joyous on each living thing;
Dips her fair fingers in the dewy showers,
To curl her vines and tint her budding flowers.
The careless zephyrs toss their wings on high,
And balmy fragrance mantles to the sky!

Let other minstrels choose for soul-inspiring themes
Thy grots, fair Hellas, and thy haunted streams!
Or sing, Italia, in their glowing lays
Thy gorgeous nights and passion-stirring days!
Or Scotland's floods, and lakes, and rugged braes
May furnish themes for their resounding praise!
Me Georgia charms, fair clime of sun and flowers,
Of waving woods, of birds and balmy showers;
Me Georgia charms, nor on the varied earth
Smiles land more fair than that which gave me birth!

THE FARMERS OF GEORGIA

Ye farmers of my native State! a noble race are ye!

The world contains no sounder heads, no hearts more bold and free;

You love the glorious Union with affection firm and true, And yet of earth is Georgia far the dearest spot to you.

Ye've lived beneath her Southern sun, until his blazing eye
Has left upon your inmost souls the impress of her sky!
For Georgia's friends they softly glow, as when the days expire;

For Georgia's foes (and there are such) they kindle into fire!

Your hearts are generous as her soil from which you dig your bread,

And never goes the stranger from your open doors unfed; The currents of your life are fresh as the flowing of her rills; The granite of your will is firm as her eternal hills. Ye farmers of my native State! ye loyal men, and true! As ye are fond of Georgia, so is Georgia proud of you; She sees no manlier spirits far as day his circle runs; She leans upon your stalwart arms as a mother on her sons,

And knows that when the tempest comes ye'll stand before the blast,

As sternly as her forest oaks, unflinching to the last! Then while ye love the Union with affection firm and true, Let Georgia still of all the earth be dearest far to you!

HAROUN ALRASCHID

A dogwood tree, with berries red,
Hung darkling o'er my woodland seat,
And far abroad its branches spread,
To shield me from the summer's heat,
As, buried in that copse the while,
Mid scented boughs of shrubbery hid,
I read of Crusoe's desert isle,
And Haroun Alraschid.

The solemn oak, with foliage dusk,
Became a palace as I read;
A dome of Oriental mosque,
The pine tree towered overhead;
And precious gems and jewels rare
Were thickly strung the leaves amid,
As rose bright cities in the air
Of Haroun Alraschid.

And veilèd maid, with sparkling eyes,
And Mussulman, with stately pace,
And genii, reaching to the skies,
And caliphs of a royal race,
And palaces, as of the dead,
Within the breast of mountains hid,
Gleamed through the forest, as I read
Of Haroun Alraschid!

Oh! often since, in lonely hours,
My heart reverts to childhood's day,
When generous fancy scattered flowers
So thickly o'er life's sunny way;
And often to the dogwood tree,
The shadows of the grove amid,
I hie in thought to dream of thee,
Great Haroun Alraschid!

THE LIVE-OAK

With his gnarled old arms, and his iron form,
Majestic in the wood,
From age to age, in the sun and storm,
The live-oak long hath stood;
With his stately air, that grave old tree,
He stands like a hooded monk,
With the gray moss waving solemnly
From his shaggy limbs and trunk.

And the generations come and go,
And still he stands upright,
And he sternly looks on the wood below,
As conscious of his might.
But a mourner sad is the hoary tree,
A mourner sad and lone,
And is clothed in funeral drapery
For the long since dead and gone.

For the Indian hunter 'neath his shade

Has rested from the chase;

And he here has wooed his dusky maid—

The dark-eyed of her race;

And the tree is red with the gushing gore

As the wild deer panting dies:

But the maid is gone, and the chase is o'er,

And the old oak hoarsely sighs.

In former days, when the battle's din
Was loud amid the land,
In his friendly shadow, few and thin,
Have gathered Freedom's band;
And the stern old oak, how proud was he
To shelter hearts so brave!
But they all are gone—the bold and free—
And he moans above their grave.

THE DOGWOOD TREE

When spring is come, on the forest height
You may see the dogwood tree,
With its robe of green, and its flowers of white,
Like a simple maid in her mantle dight,
And bedecked not gorgeously.

When the spring is here with its voice of glee,
Through the woods 'tis sweet to stray,
And to sit and muse by the dogwood tree,
While the zephyrs now are sporting free,
And the birds are on each spray.

But the maid I love is as chastely dight
As the bloom of the dogwood tree.
Not hers are the colors that dazzle the sight,
But the charms that bring to the heart delight
Are the maid's who is dearest to me!

ELLA (A Fragment)

Oh! I have tried the stormy world,
And been within its eddies whirled,
And found its joys—if ever sought—
If ever won—are dearly bought;
And I have learned that pomp and power,
The triumphs of a fleeting hour,
And all the heraldry of fame—
A world's applause—a glorious name—
Not half the sacred bliss impart
As to be loved by one true heart!

THE WHIP-POOR-WILL

Bird of the night, sad Whip-poor-will,
Alight upon yon waving tree,
And with thy sweetest warblings fill
The starlit grove for me!
And I will listen to the strain,
While eve is on her peaceful wane,
And echo on her hill,
And Nature drops her dewy tear,
And holds her softest breath to hear
Thy ditty, Whip-poor-will!

Oh! some prefer the mock-bird's note
Or queenly nightingale to hear,
Or lark's shrill quaverings, as they float
Upon the morning clear;
But none to me are half so sweet
As thus, upon a mossy seat,
To list thee, bird of grief,
And dream of hopes forever fled,
The distant past, the silent dead,
And love—the withered leaf!

And oh! when life is ended, here
I'd wish to lay me down to sleep,
Where rustling leaves shall deck my bier,
And eve her dewdrops weep;
And thou shalt keep thy vigils here,
And pour upon my spirit's ear
Thy plaintive ditty still;
And sweet shall be the melody,
And sweeter far my slumbers be,
To hear thee, Whip-poor-will!

EULOGY ON BISHOP ELLIOTT

From Eulogy on Bishop Elliott. Delivered February 12, 1867.

But, at last, the man, the scholar, the orator, the philosopher, the patriot, the philanthropist, and the Christian, combining together, culminating in the bishop at his holy ministrations. If a thing of beauty be a joy forever, here is a memory which can never die. The majestic figure that so well became the flowing robe; the benignant features kindling up with intellectual fire and pure emotion; the ringing voice, with its own peculiar tone of soulful melody; the lucid thought, the graceful diction—"touching nothing which they did not beautify"; a strong, vigorous mind, enriched by the lore of the theological schools, but yet more characterized by its quick, clear perception of the practical and the human, resulting from his knowledge of men and the ways of the world, giving at times a striking originality to his scriptural interpretations—for to the Bible at last must we look for the profoundly human and the profoundly practical—and trusting, in this age and among this people, rather to the love of the Son and the glories of Paradise to attract, than to the frowns of the Father and the terrors of Hell to appal; and, crowning all, a soul exhaustless of its sympathies as the sky of its stars, or the ocean of its pearls, and a charity broad as the shadow of an archangel's wing.

And here was the true benediction of this man; large in stature, large in intellect, in soul he was grand! And it is the soul only which grows forever; and grows most rapidly when it is fed by sorrow. Suffering and sorrow were the daily food of a God! And as they came to him, in those later and darker years, cup after cup of gall and wormwood, how grandly did he grow as he drank!

Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form, Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm; Though rolling clouds around its breast are spread, Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

WOMAN IN LITERATURE AND ART

From an Address on "Woman in Literature and Art."

THERE is an education far more comprehensive than the education of the schoolroom or the college; more comprehensive even than the education of the Church; for it embraces them all, and something beside. It is an education which begins the first, but which never ends. Commencing on the mother's knee, attending the individual from the cradle to the grave, it gives to family, to tribe, to nation, to race, their characteristic features; forms their habits, regulates their morals, moulds their manners, fashions their tastes, directs their aspirations, and graduates their rank upon the scale of social or civilized being. It is an education which may exalt to the highest, which may debase to the lowest point of human existence; an education which no human creature can possibly escape, for it is the offspring of a law as general, as despotic in the spiritual as is the law of gravitation in the physical universe. We must gravitate towards, we must assimilate to whatever we admire, to whatever we love, to whatever we adore, to the full extent of our capacity for admiration, for love, for adoration; always, of course, dependent upon the exercise of that capacity. Hence it is not possible for us to be brought into constant and intimate association with the beautiful, be it in the spiritual life, where it is synonymous with the pure; be it in the works of nature or in the works of art impossible for us to learn to admire and love it without absorbing into our own being something of its beauty. I am sure that I exaggerate in nothing; that I lay down no proposition which a philosophic study of the world's history will not fully establish, when I say that, under the operation of this cardinal law, the love of the beautiful, innate in the human soul, has been not simply the originating germ, but the vitalizing essence, of all the civilizations. . . . The desire to express —the actual expression, of ideal beauty is as natural to the human soul-ay! to the humblest human soul-in its normal condition, as are its rays to the star, its fragrance to the flower. its song to the bird. Under the impulse of this passion, the imagination has ever been at work, utilizing the elements of material nature for the expression of ideal beauty. The earth, the air, the light, sound, color, the marble, the canvas, have all been made subservient to the creative passion, as mediums for the communication of its ideals, through the material senses, to the recipient passion. Call the former art-talent, if you please; call the latter art-taste; but behold the birth and life of art!

ADDRESS ON THE "WANDERER" CASE

Extract from Address on the "Wanderer" Case.

THE next day found me actively engaged in examining the map to ascertain in what Southern States fortresses similar to Pulaski were located. At quite a late hour the following night I sent a telegram to the governors of all such states, mentioning what we were about to do and requesting them to do likewise, the telegram closing with these words: "This is fighting for our rights in the Union." And the small hours of the night found me descending the Savannah River in a small boat with one oarsman, and favored by the tide. In our descent we encountered one of the very heaviest rainfalls I have ever seen, and I remember that I saddened myself with the inquiry whether it might not be ominous of the future.

The dawn of day saw me capture Fort Pulaski by simply walking into it. No killed, no wounded, no glory. And so while Peyton—poor gallant Peyton—were he still alive, might fairly claim to be the first, last and only man active in suppressing the African slave trade at the North, I can fairly, as I do proudly, claim to be the first rebel, so-called, actively engaged upon land or water, at the South.

Gentlemen of the committee, a few more words and I shall have concluded what will probably be the last elaborate address of my life. In the year 1860 behold the two sections of the American Union! The North densely populated, marvelously inventive, poor but aggressive, chafing beneath the dominion of the South—a section of shifty shop-keepers, of laboring artisans and of struggling manufacturers. But everywhere among her people prevailed the ruling sentiment of the Anglo-Saxon race, an intense yearning for dominion, which should soon culminate in the principle of "rule or ruin." It is true that from her statesmen and her philosophers, her priests and her poets, there came creations which have upon them the impress of the touch of the divine, which the world denominates genius. The attrition which had resulted from the hard life imposed upon her by her poverty had polished the genius of many of her sons, and placed their names among the immortals. But wealth she wanted and wealth she would have at any cost, whether of principle or of policy, whether through the slave trade or through imposition of an iniquitous tariff. "Put money in thy purse" was the shibboleth of the section.

On the other hand, behold our section—the fair land of the South! Radiant in the soft sunlight which warmed her breast into generous fertility, she stood before the civilized world as the favorite child of a bountiful Providence. The loyalty of black slave to white master, the fertility of her fields, and the industry of her sons, had produced a wealth sufficient to enable a portion of her children to devote their time to affairs of state. She governed this Union for more than seventy years, but with a purpose so honest, a hand so gentle, and a heart so pure, that Heaven smiled upon this Southern queen. Her daughters excelled the storied beauty of the Orient, and her sons, in all that proclaimed true and noble manhood, had placed themselves upon an elevation which made them the envy of the struggling masses-laborers and shop-keepers—of the North. The civilization that produced these results must be destroyed! The North had the population, and precisely as the gem of purest ray serene may be overwhelmed by brass and lead and iron-so the old South fell! But from the date of her fall to the present moment, I have been entering my protest against the wanton and cruel falsehood which seeks to fasten upon her fair fame the horrors of the African slave trade and the occasional unfortunate results of slavery. The stern glory of Sparta, the rich beauty of Athens, the splendors of imperial Rome, the brilliancy of ancient Carthage, all pale before the glories of the old South —the sunny South of our forefathers—of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, and last, but not least, of Lee; and it is a source of profound satisfaction that I am able here, tonight, once again to raise my voice in denunciation of the foul slanders which would put a single stain upon her fair limbs, and once more to fervently utter the prayer that the same principles which made her the most beautiful of the creations of God and man may prevail in the future government of my country, and may bring to my fellow-countrymen everywhere, peace, prosperity and good will! But let the truth of history prevail, and each youth who first sees light in this sunny clime will, wherever his wanderings may have carried him, proudly proclaim: "Thank God, I belong to the blood and lineage of the South!"

SAMUEL M. JANNEY

[1801-1880]

JOHN W. WAYLAND

THE long life and remarkable versatility of the subject of this sketch might readily supply matter for a volume—an interesting volume, too, as his own 'Memoirs' give proof; but conditions demand brevity of the present writer; moreover, the purposes of literary history seem to require the portrayal of certain phases of that versatility to the comparative neglect of others.

Samuel M. Janney was born in Loudoun County, Virginia, January II, 1801; or, as he himself wrote it, "the 11th of 1st, month, 1801"; for he and his parents, Abijah and Jane Janney, as well as his grandparents. Janneys and McPhersons, were esteemed members of the Society of Friends. Indeed, his paternal ancestors appear to have been identified with the denomination from its beginning. Samuel's mother died when he was about twelve years old, and soon afterward his father located in the adjoining county of Fairfax, four miles west of Alexandria, where the family trade of milling was continued. At the age of fourteen the boy was placed in the counting-house of an uncle in Alexandria, and remained a member of his uncle's family until his marriage, in 1826, to Elizabeth Janney, a distant relative, During the nine years following 1830 he lived at Occoquan, sixteen miles south of Alexandria, where he was partner in a cotton factory: but, his business here proving a financial failure, he returned to his native county. Loudoun, in 1830, and established at Lincoln, near Leesburg, a boarding-school for girls. This school was called Springdale, and was conducted with success fifteen years.

The same year that Mr. Janney established this school he published his first considerable book: 'The Last of the Lenapé, and Other Poems.' From that date until the close of the Civil War period he produced his chief books—the bulk of his extensive writings. For two years and a half, beginning with May, 1869, he was Government Superintendent of Indian Affairs for seven of the northern tribes, with headquarters at Omaha. During the remainder of his life his home was at the village of Lincoln, where he died April 30, 1880. For nearly half a century prior to his death he was an active and prominent minister of the Gospel, influential and respected in Friends' councils, local and general. In doing the work of a counselor and evangelist, he made frequent trips into adjacent states; going occasionally as far north as New York, and as far west as Illinois and Iowa.

Mr. Janney's success as a teacher, his effectiveness as a preacher, and his scholarly work as a writer, are all the more remarkable in view of his meager opportunities for educational training. gether he attended school but a few years. While still a small boy in Loudoun he was taught to read; when his father located in Fairfax he went to school in Alexandria for a short time; and after entering his uncle's counting-house he attended night school for the study of French and surveying. In speaking French he became so proficient that he was complimented by a distinguished French scholar. It becomes evident, however, that his general culture must be credited in large measure to his own initiative in study, and to his fertility of resource. Being fond of books-especially of the Biblefrom a boy, he spent his leisure intervals in the counting-house in their company. He not only read much, but also reviewed his arithmetic and began the study of algebra. Having a liking for natural philosophy and chemistry, he organized his young friends into a scientific club. Apparatus was purchased, experiments were made, and lectures were delivered in turn by the several members. But the young man's strongest predilection was for literature. Accordingly, he joined a number of his associates in forming a literary society. which met once a month to read and criticize original essays. This organization existed several years, and many of the essays produced were published in literary journals.

Personally, Mr. Janney possessed a trim figure and a pleasing, refined countenance; socially, he was of genial and inviting presence; intellectually, he was acute, discriminating, and quick at repartee, though the arrows of his wit were carefully shorn of the barbs that give pain. With young and old he was a general favorite; and no wedding festivity in his neighborhood was complete without the presence of "Cousin Samuel." Serious and pious in every thought, he yet had a keen sense of humor and the artist's eye for beauty—physical beauty as well as spiritual, and for moral worth. Ecstatic amid the fields and flowers, and awed beneath the stars, he still had voice to sing:

"The latest work of heavenly care Was woman's form divinely fair."

His integrity was proved by trial. When he opened the Springdale school he had little to call his own save a huge debt depending from the business failure at Occoquan; but within the next twenty years, by writing, teaching, and settling estates, aided by his devoted wife's small income, he paid his debts-fourteen thousand dollars—and rose from the struggle with conscience clear and hope renewed. His public spirit was comprehensive and active. In common with his Society, he was a zealous advocate of peace, temperance, and freedom. As early as 1827 he published in the Alexandria Gazette a series of essays against slavery and the domestic slave trade. In 1850 his public advocacy of anti-slavery views and principles caused his prosecution in court; but his telling defence, no less than the inoffensiveness of his previous utterances, secured his release and vindication. In 1845 and 1846 he did effective work in the promotion of free public schools. As a delegate from Loudoun, he attended a convention in Richmond, and was there appointed one of a committee of fifteen, of which T. Jefferson Randolph was chairman, to draw up a report on common school education. With one other, a member of the State Legislature from Wheeling, Janney presented a minority report, favoring a system of free schools such as was then in operation in New York and New England; and, after a debate of a day and a half, carried the vote of the convention by a majority of at least three fourths. He also, in the same convention, led the opposition to the project of establishing another State military school, a project that was defeated by a close vote.

Next to all-pervasive piety, the crowning and animating virtue of Mr. Janney's character was philanthropy. This quality was in constant evidence throughout the long period of his Christian ministry, and was no less prominent in all his social and secular relations. In 1824 he assisted in teaching the poor, under the auspices of a Presbyterian Sunday-school. Soon afterward, with other young Friends, he established a First-Day school for colored children in the second story of the Friends' meeting-house. About forty years later, toward the close of the Civil War, he was instrumental in founding for the freedmen, in his native county, a Sunday-school and a week-day school, the latter of which was still in successful operation in 1899 as a graded school. Four years before Garrison established the Liberator Janney took part with other Friends in the endeavor to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. During the war he and his family ministered to the sick and wounded of both armies, and upon several occasions he rendered effective service in obtaining the release of Confederate hostages.

From early life the sufferings of the Indians enlisted his sympathy. Two of the longest poems in his collection, "The Last of the Lenapé" and "Tewinissa," exalt the Indian character and portray the pathos that attends the race. As already noted, two and a half years of his old age were given to the arduous and dangerous supervision of tribes in the Northwest. When accepting this position he did not think to ask the amount of the salary. With him, as with Tewinissa,

"None but the treasures of the heart For works of love can pay."

In a letter written August 27, 1853, Mr. Janney says: "Having given up my school, I have no secular business except that of an author." He was then about completing his second important prose work: the 'Life of George Fox.' At intervals from his youth he had been a poet and an essayist. In 1824 a poem of his, "The Country School-House," sent to New York in a competitive contest, was awarded a prize, and was published in the New York Mirror. Upon invitation of the editor, George P. Morris, he made other contributions to the same magazine. His two-months' wedding tour in 1826 must have stimulated his poetic instincts and given him many new themes, for the time was spent at Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, Lake Champlain, Glens Falls, Boston, New York, in the Catskills, and amid other scenes beautiful by nature and already storied in the rising literature of the new nation. A fine poem on Lake George dates from that year.

The volume of poems published in 1839 is a sextodecimo of 180 pages, containing in all forty-four numbers, prefaced by an excellent "Essay on Poetry." In the latter the author's poetic creed is set forth without equivocation. Poetry should portray beauty and purity; it should lift the soul of man into a contemplation of the beautiful and sublime in nature, the wise and benevolent in human life, and the benignity of the divine character. And he is true to his creed.

The forty-four pieces in the little book are grouped in six classes: Two narrative poems; six descriptive; thirteen "On the Affections"; three elegiac; five scientific—on Caloric, Light, Electricity, Astronomy, and Attraction; and fifteen miscellaneous. The longest piece of all, and the best as a whole, is a blank verse fragment of 296 lines entitled "The Triumphs of Truth"; which is the "First Part of a Poem intended to illustrate the Christian doctrine of non-resistance, and to show that the gospel has always been advanced by the sufferings of the faithful."

The verse-form throughout the collection shows much variety, blank verse alternating with the Spenserian stanza, the heroic rhyme-couplet, and other forms less distinctly named. There is one sonnet.

Occasional feminine rhymes break the masculine tread. No less than seven of the pieces are written in the verse-form of Gray's famous "Elegy." This leads to the remark that the spirit and sentiment of the author frequently remind the reader of Gray and Goldsmith. The influence of Milton is sometimes apparent; from him two or three quotations are made; and a few times, notably in "The Triumphs of Truth," the stride and strain are almost epic. Classical allusions are few; but references to Scripture are frequent. David is preferred to all the sons of Jupiter. There are occasional well-made metaphors, with abundance of pleasing similes. There is a soft caress for the primrose, and a throbbing stroke for burning Ætna. Remarkable skill is shown in making poetry out of science. For example, the lines on Caloric begin:

"Companion of the sunbeam!—thy swift flight, Though felt by all, eludes all human sight."

Perhaps the finest passage in the whole book may be found in a score of blank-verse lines in the poem on "Astronomy."

Says Mr. Janney, in his 'Memoirs':

"The edition of one thousand copies was disposed of readily, but there seemed to be no demand for another edition. Some years later I wrote and published a few other poems, but gradually my taste for poetry declined and I came to the conclusion that I should succeed better in prose, which proved to be the case."

It is certainly true that his most valuable service as an author was performed in the field of prose, though only a few words in reference to his prose works are necessary in this place. 'The Life of William Penn' (1851) and 'The Life of George Fox' (1853) ran through repeated editions, being favorably received in England as well as in America. The clear, terse style of the author, his painstaking study, and his copious reproductions of original sources make his books both interesting and valuable. From 1860 to 1868 the four volumes of his 'History of the Friends' came out. The last book he published himself was a little volume entitled 'Peace Principles Exemplified,' issued from the press in 1876. His 'Memoirs,' at first intended for the exclusive use of his children, he finally allowed to be published. The book appeared in 1881.

Thus the versatility of the man would appear if we should consider him only as an author, since he wrote, and right well, both poetry and prose, each in various fields. In the one form he sought beauty, in the other knowledge; but neither for its own sake nor his own sake. His desire passed beyond himself to others, and again beyond all creatures to the Creator:

> "To trace His wonders thro' each varying clime, And all His mercies to the sons of men."

AN ESSAY ON POETRY

All selections are from 'The Last of the Lenapé, and other Poems.'

THERE have been periods when an essay in defence of Poetry, would have been deemed as superfluous as an attempt to defend the cultivation of flower gardens and orchards; but in this utilitarian age, the wonderful discoveries of science, the progress of civil liberty, and the rapid march of improvement in the mechanic arts, in manufactures, and in navigation, have turned the attention of the public almost entirely to those pursuits which minister to the physical wants of man. It is not the design of this essay to discourage those pursuits, but merely to show that there are others which relate more immediately to the wants of the mind, and which have an equal, if not a still greater tendency to extend the sphere of human enjoyment. The happiness of man does not depend so much upon the extent of his temporal possessions, as upon the purity of his desires, and the harmonious action of his moral and intellectual powers. The proper regulation of these powers depends much upon early associations, and upon a refined taste which enables us to enjoy the grand and beautiful in nature, and teaches to appreciate those ennobling qualities of the mind and of the heart, which constitute the real dignity of man.

There is something so intrinsically beautiful in a life spent in innocence and peace amid the shades of rural retirement, that it has in all ages formed the favourite theme of the moral poet; and there are few men of cultivated minds, however they may be engrossed by the business of life, who do not indulge the hope that they will one day retire from the world, and realize those visions of happiness so long and so fondly cherished. These views, although they may never be realized in actual experience, have still a favourable influence upon the heart, and prevent its tender sensibilities from being entirely destroyed by the withering influence of a worldly spirit. If such minds could trace back the current of their thoughts to the source from whence those associations were derived, they would often find it to be from the perusal, in their youthful days, of some poem, in which the beauties of nature, and the happiness of rural life, were themes of praise.

These effects may likewise be produced by compositions in prose, conveying to the mind the same kind of impressions—but verse, if well executed, has many advantages over prose, especially as a medium to convey moral sentiments to the young. There is a natural taste in all young persons for the melody of verse—they generally show a fondness for the rhymes, the metre, and the alliteration of poetry, before they are capable of appreciating the beauty of the sentiments it conveys.

As the youthful mind advances in knowledge, the taste for metrical composition generally increases in proportion as the capacity to perceive the higher beauties of style, becomes enlarged and improved. Perhaps there is no season in which we enjoy those pleasures with a higher relish, than just before that period arrives when we are to enter upon the arduous duties of life. After the cares of business, and the intercourse of the world, have in some degree worn off the sensibilities of youth, we are apt not only to lose for a season, our relish for literature, but even to find impaired, our love for the beautiful scenery of nature. But that love, if it has once taken root, will again revive, and may in after life, become one of the sources of our highest enjoyment. For whether a man be successful or unsuccessful in the pursuit of worldly objects, he will find at last that the bright anticipations of happiness which he indulged in early life, are not to be realized in the acquisition of wealth or power; and after having joined the crowd in their eager pursuits, he will, if he attends to the admonition of experience, endeavour to attain the object of his desire in the calm and tranquil enjoyment of domestic life. Then he will find the tastes of his youth again revived; and if in early life he has imbibed a relish for intellectual and spiritual enjoyments, they will become the solace of his declining years.

But there are persons who object to the reading of poetry, because of the wild and extravagant fictions with which it abounds, and the impure images it sometimes conveys. This objection will apply equally well to compositions in prose, and until the public shall learn to discriminate, and to encourage only that which is good, we must expect the evil to continue. There is, however, no necessity for resorting to such means for entertainment, for the records of past ages, the tradition of our fathers, and the scenes of real life now acting around us, furnish the poet with abundant materials for the construction of his works. There is no necessity laid upon him to depart from the truth in his narratives or descriptions; but like the historical painter, who takes his figures from real life, and places them in attitudes suited for the performance of some action related in authentic history—although the characters may be copied from nature, yet the attitudes, the grouping, the expression, and the drapery, are his own—and these furnish him all the scope for the exercise of his talent that can be desired.

It does not however follow, because a story is true that it is therefore suitable for poetry, or even for instructive prose —for some incidents are too trivial, and others too low or disgusting, to be introduced, and it requires a discriminating taste to copy from real life, and yet to furnish a picture that shall at once afford pleasure and instruction. Fidelity to nature. and purity of moral sentiments, ought to be required of every author who aspires to public favour—but it must be acknowledged, that many modern writers in prose and verse, are sadly deficient in both of these qualifications. It was remarked some years ago, by an able writer in one of the foreign Magazines, "that in perusing some of the most popular English productions of the present day, it is impossible not to observe to what an extent our literature has been infected by the system of substituting the turbulence and sophistries of lawless passion, for the delineation of those more regular and decent movements, which appeal to our sympathy through our moral approbation. In our poets and poetical novel writers, this innovation has been most flagrant and systematic, and most successful as far as to be read with avidity, and applauded by the unthinking, can con-The fashionable notion now is, that in a work stitute success. of true genius, everything must be made subordinate to passion, no matter how unnatural or presumptuous a tone it may assume; and accordingly, our recent literature has teemed with impassioned railers against the decencies of life-impassioned marauders by sea and land-impassioned voluptuaries-impassioned renegadoes-impassioned striplings-impassioned hags: all of them venting furious sublimity upon the astonished reader, and boldly demanding his profound admiration, because they have lost all control over their actions and words."

It must be acknowledged that there is a class of writers, of whom this picture is a faithful portrait—men who have devoted the energies of the loftiest genius, to decorate the couch of voluptuousness, to conceal the deformity of vice, and to strew with the flowers of poesy, the path that leads to destruction. The personages who figure in their pages, although invested with much of heroic sentiment, would, if they lived and moved among us, be considered the most dangerous associates: and can they be proper subjects for contemplation to the inexperienced mind? There may be characters found or imagined of the most flagrant wickedness—yet having some traits that bear a resemblance to virtue, and it is in the power of a vivid imagination, by dwelling upon these, to shed around them a deceptive light which dazzles the beholder.

How many a youthful mind has followed with enthusiasm the story of some imaginary hero through all the vicissitudes of a career stained with crime! His deeds of cruelty, his relentless hate, and his unbridled passions, are lightly passed over, while the imagination is dazzled by "deeds of noble daring," by a boundless generosity, and by an impassioned devotion to some fair being who leans on him for protection.

Such characters have been portrayed by many of the poets and novelists of modern times, and their effects upon the youthful reader cannot fail to be injurious; if they do not in direct terms encourage vice, they at least sap the foundation of virtue.

But the poets and the novelists are not alone obnoxious to this charge, for even the historian has too often followed in the same path, and bestowed upon personal bravery, that praise which is only due to moral greatness. In casting the mind's eye over the literature of past ages, how much do we find that is calculated to encourage the spirit of war, and how little that tends to cherish the Christian virtues! Some of our earliest impressions derived from poetry and history, are inimical to the meek and peaceable spirit of the gospel. "We are intoxicated with the exploit of the conqueror as recorded in real history or in glowing fiction. We follow with a sympathetic ardour, his rapid and triumphant career in battle, and, unused as we are to suffering and death, forget the fallen and miserable who are crushed under his victorious car. Particularly by the study of the ancient poets and historians, the sentiments of early and barbarous ages on the subject of war are kept alive in the mind. The trumpet which roused the fury of Achilles, and of the hordes of Greece, still resounds in our ears, and though Christians by profession, some of our earliest and deepest impressions are received in the school of uncivilized antiquity." May we not hope that the benign influence of the gospel of Christ, and increasing light of civilization, will yet more and more influence mankind, until we shall have a literature suited to the wants of a Christian people—a literature that instead of rousing the warlike passions, and inciting the love of worldly glory, will tend to soothe the perturbed spirit, and inspire the contemplated mind with a relish for piety, harmony and peace? It appears to me that such a day must yet arrive, and he that would write for posterity, must cultivate in his own mind, and endeavour to impress upon his works, those sentiments which are suited for a purer and happier age. In these views I am supported by one of the greatest of modern poets, who says:

"Noise, is there not enough in doleful war, But that the heaven-born poet must stand forth And lend the echoes of his sacred shell, To multiply and aggravate the din? Pangs, are there not enough in hopeless love; And in requited passion, all too much Of turbulence, anxiety and fear, But that the minstrel of the rural shade Must tune his pipe insidiously, to nurse The perturbation in the suffering breast, And propagate its kind where'er he may? Ah! who (and with such rapture as befits The hallowed theme) will rise and celebrate The good man's deeds and purposes, retrace His struggles, his discomfiture deplore, His triumphs hail, and glorify his end?"

-Wordsworth.

It is not favourable to virtue, for the mind to dwell too much upon scenes of depravity and guilt, whether they be described in authentic history, or portrayed in glowing colours by the novelist or the poet. But let us rather contemplate the beautiful and sublime in nature, and the wise and benevolent in human life, and more especially let us keep ever in our view the glorious benignity of the divine character, as exhibited in the works of creation, and taught and exemplified by Jesus Christ.

"For the attentive mind
By this harmonious action on her powers,
Becomes herself harmonious: wont so oft
In outward things to meditate the charm
Of sacred order, soon she seeks at home
To find a kindred order, to exert
Within herself this elegance of love,
This fair inspir'd delight: her temper'd powers
Refine at length, and every passion wears
A chaster, milder, more attractive mien."

-Akenside.

We shall then find that poetry of the highest order will find a response in our own feelings, and be like a mirror to present to our view the images of our past emotions—for true poetic feeling is not confined to the bosom of the poet—it is felt at times by every pure and elevated mind, when placed in circumstances favourable for its development. For instance, when, retired from the bustle of the world and surrounded by beautiful and tranquil scenery, we muse upon the uncertainty of life and think upon the dear companions of our childhood who have passed away from this scene of existence. Who is there that does not realize on such an occasion, that impassioned feeling which is the soul of poetry? The impressions which are thus made upon the mind may lie concealed for years, but if we meet with a passage by which they are revived, or by which kindred associations are produced, how delightful it is to hear the harmonious numbers sounding in our ears like the echoes of the past! But although these emotions which are poetical in their nature, may at times prevail in almost every mind, it must be conceded that the power of describing them so as to convey their images distinctly to others, is a faculty possessed by few; and in this faculty chiefly consists the characteristic of the poet.

If this view be correct, it would seem that although poetry, as an art, must be confined to a few, yet the cultivation of poetic feelings and associations is open for us all; and there can be no doubt it was intended by the beneficent Author of our being, to be a source of refined and exalted enjoyment. And this enjoyment does not depend entirely upon the beauty of language, or the harmony of verse—although these have conferred upon it additional charms—it depends chiefly upon that harmony of the mind—that music of the soul—which is independent of audible sounds, and which may be felt by the contemplative mind to draw us away from the things of time, and to direct our thoughts to that region of sublime enjoyment, where every heart will be attuned to harmony and love.

"Thus the men

Whom nature's works can charm, with God himself Hold converse; grow familiar day by day With his conceptions; act upon his plan, And form to his the relish of their souls."

-Akenside.

THE PEAKS OF OTTER

Behold yon peak with rocks gigantic crown'd, And with a forest girdle circled round; Its graceful outline swells before the eye, In pleasing contrast with the azure sky; And clothed in richest robes of living green, It towers, the monarch of the mountain scene.

Tho' years have flown, and joys and sorrows past Have o'er my path their lights and shadows cast; Yet memory still in vivid colours shows, The glorious scene that on my vision rose, When on that peak in musing solitude, To watch the dawning of the day I stood. First in the eastern sky those streaks of gray, The blended hues of light and shade display;

Succeeded soon by tints of roseate dye, Whose brightening radiance spreads along the sky; And many a cloud attends in rich array, To catch the glories of the rising day. Far as the eye can reach, the prospect wide With valleys, hills, and plains diversified, Seen in the distance from this mountain height, Like one vast plain is spread before the sight: Where, seen at times and then conceal'd from view, The glittering streams their winding course pursue, And sleeping mists in every valley lie, Like bright, still lakes, deceptive to the eye. But see! the rising sun with splendour glows, The mists, awaken'd from their deep repose, In graceful shapes their changeful forms display! Then take the morning's wing and soar away; What beauteous colours burst upon the sight, Caught and reflected from the orb of light, By whose bright beams uplifted, they appear To rise triumphant to a higher sphere.

Does not you glorious orb an emblem seem Of that eternal and life giving Beam, Which from the soul can chase the gloom of night, Refine and clothe it with a robe of light, Endow with feelings of celestial birth, And bear triumphant o'er the things of earth?

As westward now we turn our wondering view O'er you wide-scattered hills and mountains blue; We see the shadow of this lofty cone, O'er many a distant ridge distinctly thrown, Whose long-extended lines and graceful sweep, Seem like the billows of the rolling deep.

Oh! who on such a scene as this can gaze, Nor feel his bosom glow with grateful praise To Him whose potent voice the word but said, And mountains started from their ocean bed. And oh! my country when I thus behold The wide-extended plains, and mountains bold, The vales secluded, thy embow'ring woods, Thy rivers rolling their majestic floods,

Thy mighty cataract's unrivall'd scene,
And thy broad lakes that spread their waves serene—
I feel the greatness of thy destiny,
And breathe to heaven the fervent prayer for thee,
That like thy scenery may thy virtues shine,
And bear the impress of a stamp divine.

TO SERENA

Oh! why, Serena, dost thou wear, So frequent on thy placid brow, That sweetly musing pensive air, That clothes it now?

Methinks in many a lonely hour,

The fading charms of earth resign'd,
Thou find'st in contemplation's bower,

Joys more refin'd.

When worldly cares, and scenes of mirth, And all the fleeting dreams of life, Whose influence binds us down to earth, Have ceas'd their strife,

Thou know'st 'tis then the unfetter'd soul, Enraptur'd, seeks the "world of mind," And spurning earth's severe control, Soars unconfin'd.

'Tis then we find this speck of earth Was never destin'd to confine A soul that claims a heavenly birth—A spark divine.

Hast thou not thought in hours like this, How strange that mortals should forego, The only lasting source of bliss, And balm of woe? To sport awhile on pleasure's stream,

To breathe of flattery's pois'nous breath,
And then from life's illusive dream

Awake in death.

For me, all heedless as I am,
A wanderer from the perfect way,
When restless fancy finds a calm,
These feelings sway.

Then looking back with heartfelt pain, Life's fleeting pleasures I review, Repent, and say to Folly's train, Vain shades, adieu!

But ah! this vital spark, the mind, Is wedded to a frame of clay, And all the follies, thus resign'd, Resume their sway.

Still then, Serena, may'st thou wear,
Forever on thy placid brow,
That sweetly musing, pensive air,
That clothes it now.

What tho' thy heart of purity,
Life's various follies hath resign'd,
Still may'st thou mourn—yes, mourn for me,
And all mankind.

Should some pure seraph from above, A being of celestial birth, Come down, a messenger of love, And dwell on earth:

When he beheld th' afflictive scene,
The prostrate state of souls divine,
His brow, methinks, a pensive mien
Would wear like thine.

SOMETHING NEW

There is, methinks, beneath the sun (Whate'er the Jewish sage may say) One object fair, and only one, That still is new from day to day.

Is it the bright kaleidoscope,
That changes, turn it as you will?
Is it the rainbow, arch of hope,
More beauteous and more changeful still?

Is it the cloud that veils the west, So gorgeously at summer even; Which seems as tho' some spirit blest, Were opening the gates of heaven?

Oh! no; it wears one constant hue,

More bright than all of these can prove;
It is (I trust thou know'st it too)

It is the holy flame of love.

The brightest things of earth will tire,
Whate'er the charms they may display—
The birds of spring, the minstrel's lyre,
And e'en the cheering light of day.

But ah! there is in this a light,
So clear, so constant, and so true;
From night till morn, and morn till night,
We watch it, and it still is new.

EVENING ENJOYMENTS

Come gentle eve, I long to prove
The sweets of thy delightful reign,
When Luna walks in light above,
And Vesper leads her starry train.

But 'tis not Luna's silvery ray,
Nor Vesper's light I long to see,
For love, Serena, lights my way,
And guides my gladsome steps to thee.

I haste thy tender smile to meet,
To gaze on thy soul-beaming eye,
To hear thy voice so soft and sweet,
And breathe for thee affection's sigh.

Or when the pleasing cares of home
Thy hands engage in cheerful toil,
Bright fancy's page, or wisdom's tome,
I'll ope and read for thee, the while.

Thus, joyfully, we'll pass the eve, While northern tempests sweep the air, And thus the hand of love shall weave, For Winter's brow, a garland fair.

And may that Power who reigns above, And smiles on hearts united here, Preserve the beauteous wreath of love, And make it brighter every year.

ASTRONOMY

How do I love when Evening spreads her veil, And Silence keeps her secret watch around, To cast aside the anxious cares of life, And hold communion with the starry spheres.

Still, as the glimmering day-light fades away, The constellations one by one emerge; Scarce seen at first amidst the depths of ether, But soon more numerous, more refulgent glow, Till all the sky is spangled with their blaze.

But see! with graceful step their Science comes! Her optic tube she holds before our sight, And countless stars, lost to unaided vision, Burst forth from darkness on the raptur'd view: In every star another sun we trace,
Round which vast worlds unceasingly revolve,
And likewise these encircled by their moons,
Harmonious, moving in their lesser spheres.
But still the mind would soar beyond this scene,
And thoughtful muse on Him—the Great Supreme;
Who, like a shepherd on some eminence,
That watches o'er his flock, beholds with joy
Their sportive gambols o'er the extended plain.

How sinks vain boastful man in nothingness With such a scene compar'd! What is our earth, This little scene of tumult and turmoil, Where warriors strive for empire—statesmen grasp That phantom power—and misers gather dust?

Oh! say, ye radiant orbs that wheel thro' space, In distance vast, in number infinite—
Lives there upon your surfaces a race,
Like ours in form, like ours of transient date,
And fallen like ours from pristine purity?

To say ye shine for us, and us alone,
Presumption's height would be—shall those vast orbs
Form'd like our earth, but how much more immense!
Wheel through the deserts of infinity,
And waft no praises to their Maker's ear?
Reason forbids. Methinks I see the forms
Of beings like ourselves move thro' the scene:
Fain would I hope, more pure, more blest than we Perhaps amid those worlds to us unknown,
Some blooming Edens yet there may remain,
Where man, the image of his Sire divine,
Still tastes the raptures of unsullied bliss.
Perhaps those countless myriads yet are pure,
And ours the only world defil'd with sin.

But these are subjects hidden from our search—In bounteous wisdom hid—for could we see The just amount of our own littleness, And magnitude immense of Power divine, Hope would expire amid the blaze of Truth. Oh! how immense His goodness then who breathes His quickening spirit thro' the universe,

Controls the movements of the vast machine, And all its light and energy imparts:
Who not alone permits our being here,
But makes his dwelling with the pure in heart.

Should we not then to nobler life aspire,
Cast off the cares which bind us down to earth
And hail the approach of that auspicious day,
When the dark veil which now obscures our sight,
By death shall be withdrawn, and the pure soul
Soar thro' the regions of infinity,
All light, and life, intelligence and joy?

LINES

Written in an Album.

Methinks an emblem of the cultur'd mind,
The rich and varied Album was design'd;
Friendship and love, like amaranthine flowers,
Bloom here, selected from unnumber'd bowers;
And taste and genius each succeeding year,
Shall bring fresh flowers to shed their fragrance here.
Fain would I plant in this delightful spot,
That little modest flower—Forget-me-not:
And oh! how happy, could I dare presume,
'Twere worth transplanting in thy heart to bloom.

THE PATIENT SUFFERER

From 'The Triumphs of Truth.'

But oh! Celestial Love, be thou my theme,
Whose reign was promis'd by the heavenly choir,
When erst the babe of Bethlehem was born.
In him thy spirit dwelt in fulness then,
And with thy people still in measure dwells,
Proclaiming peace on earth, good-will to men.
Tho' meek and lowly does thy form appear
To him whose eye is dazzled by the blaze
Of martial fame, yet do they hold thee dear,

Whose hearts are touch'd with thy celestial flame, Whose eyes are open'd to behold the joys That from obedience to thy dictates flow. How hast thou suffer'd in the sons of men And how the sufferings of thy righteous seed In every age, have been the means ordain'd. The light of truth to spread, the hearts of men To subjugate, and even to draw forth From persecuting zeal, a pitying tear. Behold the sufferings of the Son of God. And mark the triumph by those sufferings wrought! He came to bear a testimony pure To heavenly Truth: to manifest on earth The love unspeakable of God to man. At every step his progress was oppos'd By bigotry, hypocrisy, and pride. Their errors he condemn'd, their pride reprov'd. And all their vile hypocrisy expos'd. They rose against him, and he meekly bore Their taunts and their derision—when they smote, His unresisting form was like the sheep Before its shearers dumb: the stripes severe, By their iniquity impos'd—the crown And purple robe, in mockery put on, And even the tortures of that lingering death Caus'd not a murmur to escape his lips. At that dread hour the heavens were veil'd in gloom. And earth affrighted, with convulsions shook: Yet still the patient sufferer on the cross. Look'd down benignly on the sons of men.

THOMAS JEFFERSON

[1743-1826]

THOMAS E. WATSON

THOMAS JEFFERSON was born in Shadwell, Albemarle County, Virginia, April 13 (April 2d., O.S.), 1743. His father was Peter Jefferson, a surveyor, of Welsh descent; his mother, Jane Randolph, was a daughter of a patrician house of Virginia, tracing her ancestry back to the Earls of Murray in Scotland.

After preparatory training at home, Thomas Jefferson entered William and Mary College, from which he was graduated in 1762. He gave himself to study at home, and returned to Williamsburg to read law under George Wythe. He was admitted to the Bar in 1767, and at once began the practice of law. His public career began with his election to represent his native county, Albemarle, in the House of Burgesses. This was in 1767, when he was but twenty-three years old. He gave personal attention to his farming operations, but never allowed this to interfere with his reading and special studies.

On New Year's Day of 1772 he married Martha Skelton, a childless young widow, daughter of John Wayles, a rich lawyer of Williamsburg. By this marriage he added to his patrimony of eight thousand acres an additional forty thousand acres. This dowry, however, was burdened by a British debt of $19,000. That Mr. Jefferson allowed this debt to accumulate by neglecting the payment of principal or interest, and at the same time expanded his household expenses on the most lavish scale, finally led to his financial embarrassment.

In 1773 he was again elected a member of the House of Burgesses, and signalized his return to public life by writing the "summary view" of the cause of trouble between the American colonies and the mother country. The next year he was elected to Congress, and was made chairman of a committee to draft the Declaration of Independence. In 1776 he refused reëlection to Congress because he preferred to serve in the lower house of the Virginia General Assembly. Here, within two years, he succeeded in revising the laws of Virginia, in abolishing the laws of entail and primogeniture, and in effecting the separation of Church and State. In 1779 he was elected Governor, and then reëlected to serve a second time. During this term he narrowly escaped capture by the invading British Army; but in spite of occupations and disturbances he prepared his famous 'Notes on Virginia.' On the sixth day of September of this year, 1781, he lost his wife.

Reëlected to Congress in 1783, he secured the passage of a bilimaking the dollar the unit of value of United States coins. In the following year he was given a general commission as Minister to Europe to negotiate treatics of commerce, and in 1785 succeeded Dr. Franklin as Minister to France. He returned to America in 1790 to accept the highest position in President Washington's first Cabinet, but resigned in 1793. He was Republican candidate for President, but was defeated by John Adams, becoming himself, according to the rules of that time, Vice-president. His duties as presiding officer of the Senate led him to prepare his 'Manual of Parliamentary Practice.' His States' Rights views were set forth in the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798.

Having become Vice-president under Adams, he finally became President by the action of the House of Representatives in breaking the tie between himself and Aaron Burr. The purchase of the Louisiana Territory was the major achievement of his first administration, as "laying the embargo" was of his second.

In 1809 he retired to Monticello and to private life, and from that time never sought public office or mingled much with people away from Monticello. To relieve himself of pressing debt, he sold his library to Congress for $23,000, and tried to put his large plantation in good condition. His chief employment up to 1816 was found in corresponding with a large circle of personal and public friends at home and abroad.

The last ten years of his life were given with singleness of purpose, unflagging interest, and energy to establishing the University of Virginia. He saw it opened on March 7, 1825, and lived into the middle of its second summer, giving to every detail of its material and spiritual existence his liveliest attention.

On July 4, 1826, near the middle of the day, the illustrious statesman breathed his last. He was buried on the slope of the little mountain, by the side of his brother-in-law and bosom friend, Dabney Carr, who had died in the very dawn of his greatness.

After his death his debts swept away all of his accumulated possessions, including his beloved home on the little mountain where he had brought his young bride, and where throughout his life he had dispensed so lavish a hospitality.—Ed.]

The characters of such men as Alexander Hamilton, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, and John C. Calhoun are comparatively simple, but anyone who has made a study of Thomas Jefferson is impressed by the complexity and variety of the subject.

Hamilton was a lawyer-statesman and nothing else, unless credit be given him for a certain aptitude for military affairs. Daniel Webster presents the same familiar type of lawyer-statesman—a man of few convictions upon any subject, an intellectual gladiator of colossal proportions, to whom the world owes but little in the way of creative statesmanship. Mr. Clay was also the lawyer-statesman, whose actual achievements in legislative fields were of very great importance in shaping the destinies of his country. Mr. Calhoun was the student-statesman—intense, almost fanatical in his devotion to his convictions. When we remember his herculean labors and his wonderful intellectual equipment, the comparative barrenness of results presented by his record is almost pathetic.

Turning from these, we find in Mr. Jefferson infinite variety, a range of thought and of work that takes him from the most trivial actuality to the sublimest heights of vague philanthropic speculation. In a small way, he was a manufacturer; on an extensive scale, he was a farmer; he was a practical architect and landscape gardener; he was an inventor, a surveyor, a mechanic, a musician, a scholar, a lawyer, a politician, a diplomatist, a constructive statesman, a founder of educational institutions, a successful law-giver, a chief magistrate, a bold theorist and a radical thinker, who in religion and in politics scouted authority and rested all convictions upon enlightened reason.

The estate of Monticello was almost a self-sustaining republic, governed by the patriarchal authority of Mr. Jefferson himself. In his garden, in his orchards, in his fields, in his pastures, were grown everything that was needed to support life on the place. The bread on the table at the "Big House" and in the cabin came from the grain grown upon the estate, and was made into flour, or meal, at Mr. Jefferson's own mill on the Rivanna. The clothing that was used on the plantation was woven on the farm; the brick which entered into the construction of the buildings, large and small, were burned upon the place; the nails were forged in his own blacksmith shop, or nail factory. The mutton that came to his table was a home productso with the various other necessary provisions. Not content with the very best that the American market offered, he sought abroad for improved seeds, implements, and methods. He introduced heavy upland rice from Italy and Africa; he imported Merino sheep to improve native stock; he himself designed patterns of plows, and is, perhaps, entitled to the credit of being the original inventor of the mould-board of the turn-plow. His talent for practical invention manifested itself in his famous "whirligig chair," of which so much fun was made at the time, and which was the forerunner of the revolving chair of our day. The extension-top buggy and carriage of the modern world dates from the modest invention of Mr. Jefferson, and it would seem that he was the first to contrive the folding-chair. As a lawyer, Mr. Jefferson was more profound than practical. He had mastered the science of jurisprudence, but a natural shrinking from wordy debate, and a huskiness of throat which prevented his speaking long above a conversational tone, made it impossible for him to cope with attorneys very much less fully equipped with legal lore, but more richly endowed with self-confidence and strong lungs. Mr. Jefferson enjoyed a comfortable law practice and a fairly good income, but this practice was probably business which was transacted in his office or before the chancelor. We do not hear of his taking a conspicuous part in any great battle before a jury. Doubtless he was employed often to assist in the preparation of such cases, for his learning and ability were recognized by every member of his profession.

As a party leader, a practical politician, Mr. Jefferson easily ranks among the first. Although he never made a political speech during the whole course of his life, never had a newspaper controversy, and never conducted a personal canvass, he was, nevertheless, one of the most expert managers who ever brought into organization the various elements which go to make up a strong political party. So far as we know, he is the only party chief who ever accomplished his purpose by the writing of private letters. The skill with which he did this, and the perfect success with which he organized the Republicans to overthrow the Federalists, immediately after the retirement of Washington, was wonderful. Before they knew what was happening, John Adams, Alexander Hamilton, and Washington himself, found their party broken into fragments and the advancing column of Jeffersonians marching to take possession of the Government.

In practical statesmanship, the fame of Mr. Jefferson must always rest in a large measure upon his work in his own State. Personally, very much of an aristocrat, and a grand seigneur in his style of living, he was in principle a Democrat to the core. He detested special privilege, abhorred class-distinction, believed in keeping the doors open for all. In Virginia he found a union of Church and State which taxed the people and divided the spoils; he made war upon the Established Church, divorced it from the State, and put all religious denominations upon an equal footing. He found a land monopoly perpetuating itself by means of the laws of entail and primogeniture. He made war upon this wreck of feudalism, abolished the law of entail, made all the children equally the heirs of the parents.

and thus shattered the landed aristocracy of the Old Dominion. It is needless to say that they never forgave him for it.

He also endeavored to secure the passage of an act in favor of religious freedom, but failed. It was not until 1786 that Mr. Madison succeeded in securing the adoption of the Bill for Religious Toleration which Mr. Jefferson had first presented in 1776. He formulated a magnificent system of graded schools for his native State, and the Legislature gave its enthusiastic approval to the plan. To the counties, however, was left the option of taxing themselves to support these schools, and they would never consent to assume the burden.

In national life, Mr. Jefferson's statesmanship is shown in his bold leadership of the revolutionary movement; his masterly statement of the rights and the grievances of the colonies; in the Declaration of Independence, which he drafted at the request of the committee chosen by Congress for that work; his efforts to abolish slavery in Virginia, and his attempt to debar it from the great Northwestern Territory after the year 1800; his plan for the admission of new states, as they should be formed out of the Northwestern Territory; his co-öperation with Gouverneur Morris in creating a national currency system based upon the dollar unit; his putting an end to the exactions of the Barbary Powers, partly by fighting and partly by negotiations; his check to monarchical tendencies, which were rapidly growing up under the administration of General Washington and the elder Adams; and his daring initiative in making the Louisiana Purchase, whereby the area of the Republic was doubled, at an expense of $15,000,000.

New England historians find an inexhaustible source of ridicule and denunciation in the embargo which Mr. Jefferson laid upon American commerce. They make no proper allowance for the situation in which Mr. Jefferson found himself-a situation for which he was not at all responsible. The infant Republic had no navy; Mr. Jefferson could not improvise one. Without a navy, the United States was helpless on the high seas. In the furious combat between Great Britain and Bonaparte, a weak neutral was between the hammer and the anvil. Outraged by both contending Powers, we were unable to protect ourselves from either. It is difficult to see what better plan could have been adopted than that which Mr. Jefferson favored. The embargo simply kept our vessels at home. Had New England showed any of the spirit of self-sacrificing patriotism, the embargo might have brought Great Britain to terms; but the position of the New England States was so very selfish, so very unpatriotic, that the embargo never had a fair chance. With the New England States plotting treason with Great Britain and violating the laws of our own country, openly defying the Government and threatening to secede from the Union. the task of Mr. Jefferson was rendered doubly difficult. Those who carefully study the later history of the mother country must be impressed by the fact that she suffered terribly from the embargo, and that had New England been as loyal to the Government as was the South—which was the heavier loser by the embargo—this much maligned measure of Mr. Jefferson's administration might have been one of his most brilliant triumphs.

As a scholar, a man of letters, Mr. Jefferson is a most attractive study. Emphatically, he was a lover of learning. He was a model schoolboy, a model college student. He never skimmed anything; he went to the very bottom of everything. He was a master of mathematics, of Latin, of Greek, of French; he explored the whole field of ancient and modern literatures; he was probably the best read statesman of his time; not one of his compeers had so easy and flowing a style of composition. From the writings of no other public man of his time can be selected so many quotable sentences. The history of the world presents no parallel to the manner in which he wrote himself upon his own age, and subsequent ages, with his pen. He was no teacher, like Plato; he was not a professional littérateur, like Voltaire; he was not a mere maker of books, like Carlyle; and yet he put his stamp indelibly upon the minds and the hearts of English-speaking people during his own day and for all time to come.

The world knows him best, of course, by the Declaration of Independence, but that is not by any means the best specimen of his composition; in fact, the famous Declaration is little more than a clever stringing together of truisms and generalities which were current in the spoken and written discussions of that period. His letters on finance—for instance, those to John W. Eppes; his letters on religion—for instance, those to his nephew, Peter Carr; his letters from Paris to James Madison on questions of government, land ownership. and public debt; the Diary which he kept while Minister to France. descriptive of the conditions of the French people prior to their Revolution; the various gems which are to be found in his 'Notes on Virginia'; his masterly Preamble and Bill in favor of Religious Freedom; his denunciations of the national banking system; his arraignment of the Federal Judiciary, and his prophetic predictions of the manner in which that body would usurp jurisdiction, destroy States' Rights, and build up imperialism; his magnificent paragraphs arraigning Hamilton's theories and setting forth his own glorious conception of government—these portions of Mr. Jefferson's writings rank far above anything that can be found in the Declaration of Independence.

Men of letters, at home and abroad, delighted in the companionship of Mr. Jefferson. The most distinguished savants of Europe felt complimented by his friendship. His hospitable home was a Mecca toward which every wandering scholar touring our country invariably turned his footsteps. The most distinguished nobles, like the Marquis de Chastellux and the Marquis de La Fayette, as well as the plain civilian, without title or fortune, found a warm welcome at Monticello. Whether it was a world-hero like Kosciuszko, or a discredited patriot like Thomas Paine, to the royal friendship of Mr. Jefferson it made no difference. The world's praise of his friends added nothing to the warmth of Mr. Jefferson's attachment, and the world's coldness toward a friend never chilled his courageous kindness.

There are so many fine passages in the writings of Mr. Jefferson that it is no easy task to select those which are the most excellent. In a letter to Mrs. Maria Cosway, written from Paris in 1786, occurs a tribute to friendship which is as nearly perfect as anything to be found in literature; his analysis of the character of George Washington; his description of the character and doctrines of Jesus Christ; his prophetic arraignment of the Federal Judiciary in his letters to Thomas Ritchie, Judge Roane, and in his autobiography; his letter to Governor Langdon on the kings of Europe: his prophecy of the civil convulsion which was sure to follow the establishment of a geographical principle in the choice of a president of the United States; his letter to James Smith on Unitarianism; his description of the passage of the united Shenandoah and Potomac Rivers through the Blue Ridge Mountains; his study of the North American Indians and of the Negro (in his 'Notes on Virginia')—these are but a few examples of Mr. Jefferson's power in prose composition.

In reviewing his voluminous writings, it is but just to him to remember that instead of being a recluse, a bookworm, a writer by profession, he was from early youth to old age at the very forefront of the world-movements of his time. His activity covered a broader surface, and his range of thought a wider territory, than those of any other American statesman.

From the day when he took up a popular subscription to clear the Rivanna of its obstructions, so that local produce might have a convenient highway to market, to the day when, as a tottering old man, he superintended the progress of the building of the University of Virginia, going in person as long as he could ride, and then watching the work through a telescope from the terrace at Monticello, there is a nobler sum total of effort and achievement than can be shown by any worker that ever toiled on this continent.

The enemies of Mr. Jefferson have accused him of effeminancy, if not of cowardice. They have accused him of double-dealing and political dishonesty. Was it an effeminate man, a coward, who bearded the haughty landed aristocracy of Virginia, fought it foot to foot, and with calm intrepidity overthrew it? Was it a coward who took unflinchingly the terrible denunciations of New England preachers, never so much as condescending to say a word to the public on the subject of his religious beliefs? Was it a coward who so boldly led the younger and more radical statesmen during the Revolutionary period that his name was honored by a place on the list of those whom the King of England marked for destruction? Was it a coward who violated the Constitution, and took the tremendous responsibility of purchasing all of Louisiana, when the country at that time wanted no more than New Orleans and the right to navigate the Mississippi? Was it a coward who threw himself against the disunion movement of his own people after the passage of the Alien and Sedition Acts?

Like all politicians, from Washington down to Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Jefferson dealt in diplomacy. He was not a man without guile; he did not always try to walk through the woods with a plank strapped to his chest. He generally followed the line of least resistance. The manner in which he played with Aaron Burr, smiling upon him to the very day when it was safe to throw him over, and then throwing him over without hesitation or scruple, or the slightest remembrance of the splendid service which Burr had rendered to the Republicans in New York, does not make a pretty picture. The way in which he treated John Randolph, of Roanoke, is far from being admirable. But the career of every practical politician presents just such disagreeable features; and, after all, one must judge the statesman by his purpose, by his motive, by his achievement. The master mind moves smaller men, here and there, as the exigencies of the case seem to require; the smaller men are but pawns on the board.

Far ahead of his day, Mr. Jefferson used his utmost efforts to have Virginia adopt a plan of gradual emancipation, and it is worthy of notice that his plan contemplated the removal of the Negro from this country. He was an expansionist of imperial proportions. He was not only first in demanding that our frontiers reach from sea to sea and from Lakes to Gulf, but he longed for Cuba and cast wistful glances upon Canada.

He believed that the Government should be the sole creator of money; that banks should be restricted to legitimate banking—loans, discounts, and exchange. He favored free commerce with all nations; he was opposed to standing armies and expensive naval establishment; he placed economy among the first and most important of republican virtues, and declared that a permanent public debt was one of the dangers to be feared. The true purpose of government, according to him, was to guarantee the equal rights of man. He was opposed to intermeddling with the affairs of Europe, and he was equally opposed to European intermeddling in affairs on this side of the Atlantic. He bitterly denounced our internal revenue system. On the subject of protection he could never be persuaded further than to say that "it might be best for the general interest to foster for a while certain infant manufactures until they are strong enough to stand against foreign rivals; but when evident that they could never be so, it is against right to make the other branches of industry support them." He was a strong believer in states' rights, opposing the Federal Government in its usurpation of powers not expressly granted by the States. He was opposed to the elaboration of our diplomatic establishment; did not favor the multiplication of offices and high salaries; was in favor of the utmost freedom of conscience and of the press, always regarding with instinctive jealousy the encroachment of religious intolerance and bigotry.

Like most public men, the end of his career found him steeped in disappointment and melancholy. Did not the brave and dashing Henry Clay at last lose hope and say bitterly to the young men about him: "Be dogs rather than politicians"? Did not the vulture of vain regrets and black broodings eat out the heart of John C. Calhoun? Did any mortal ever carry a sadder face, or more despairing eyes, than did Daniel Webster as he tottered toward the grave? We are not surprised, therefore, when we find Mr. Jefferson, in a moment when despondent, writing to Francis Willis: "The happiest moments of my life have been the few which I have passed at home in the bosom of my family. Employment anywhere else is a mere loss of time. It is burning the candle of life in perfect waste for the individual himself. I have no complaint to make against anybody. I have had more of the confidence of my country than my share. I only say that public employment contributes neither to advantage nor happiness; it is but exile from one's family and affairs."

ACT ESTABLISHING RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Well aware that Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burdens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy Author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do; that the impious presumption of legislators and rulers, civil as well as ecclesiastical, who, being themselves but fallible and uninspired men, have assumed dominion over the faith of others, setting up their own opinions and modes of thinking as the only true and infallible, and as such endeavoring to impose them on others, hath established and maintained false religions over the greatest part of the world, and through all time; that to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern, and whose powers he feels most persuasive to righteousness, and is withdrawing from the ministry those temporal rewards, which proceeding from an approbation of their personal conduct, are an additional incitement to earnest and unremitting labors for the instruction of mankind; that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, more than our opinions in physics or geometry; that, therefore, the proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to the offices of trust and emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injuriously of those privileges and advantages to which in common with his fellow citizens he has a natural right; that it tends also to corrupt the principles of that very religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing, with a monopoly of worldly honors and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it; that though indeed those are criminal who do not withstand such temptation, yet neither are those innocent who lay the bait in their way; that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles, on the supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being of course judge of that tendency, will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own; that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government, for its offices to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order; and finally, that truth is great and will prevail if left to herself, that she is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate, error ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly, That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened in his body, or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions, or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in nowise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

And though we well know this Assembly, elected by the people for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, have no power to restrain the acts of succeeding assemblies, constituted with the powers equal to our own, and that therefore to declare this act irrevocable would be of no effect in law, yet we are free to declare and do declare, that the rights hereby asserted are of the natural rights of mankind, and that if any act shall be hereafter passed to repeal the present or to narrow its operation, such act will be an infringement of natural right.

SECOND INAUGURAL ADDRESS

March 4, 1805.

PROCEEDING, fellow citizens, to that qualification which the Constitution requires, before my entrance on the charge again conferred upon me, it is my duty to express the deep sense I entertain of this new proof of confidence from my fellow citizens at large, and the zeal with which it inspires me, so to conduct myself as may best satisfy their just expectations.

On taking this station on a former occasion, I declared the principles on which I believed it my duty to administer the affairs of our commonwealth. My conscience tells me that I have, on every occasion, acted up to that declaration, according to its obvious import, and to the understanding of every candid mind.

In the transaction of your foreign affairs, we have endeavored to cultivate the friendship of all nations, and especially of those with which we have the most important relations. We have done them justice on all occasions, favored where favor was lawful, and cherished mutual interests and intercourse on fair and equal terms. We are firmly convinced and we act on that conviction, that with nations, as with individuals, our interests soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties; and history bears witness to the fact, that a just nation is taken on its word, when recourse is had to armaments and wars to bridle others.

At home, fellow citizens, you best know whether we have done well or ill. The suppression of unnecessary offices, of useless establishments and expenses, enabled us to discontinue our internal taxes. These covering our land with offices, and opening our doors to their intrusions, had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained from reaching successively, every article of produce and property. If among these taxes some minor ones fell which had not been inconvenient, it was because their amount would not have paid the officers who collected them, and because, if they had any merit, the State authorities might adopt them, instead of others less approved.

The remaining revenue on the consumption of foreign articles is paid cheerfully by those who can afford to add foreign luxuries to domestic comforts, being collected on our seaboards and frontiers only, and incorporated with the transactions of our mercantile citizens, it may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask, what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer, ever sees a tax-gatherer of the United States? These contributions enable us to support the current expenses of the government, to fulfil contracts with foreign nations, to extinguish the native right of soil within our limits, to extend those limits, and to apply such a surplus to our public debts, as places at a short day their final redemption, and that redemption once effected, the revenue thereby liberated may, by a just repartition among the states, and a corresponding amendment of the Constitution, be applied, in time of peace, to rivers, canals, roads, arts, manufactures, education, and other great objects within each state. In time of war, if injustice, by ourselves or others, must sometimes produce war, increased as the same revenue will be increased by population and consumption, and aided by other resources reserved for that crisis, it may meet within the year all the expenses of the year, without encroaching on the rights of future generations, by burthening them with the debts of the past. War will then be but a suspension of useful works, and a return to a state of peace, a return to the progress of improvement.

I have said, fellow citizens, that the income reserved had enabled us to extend our limits; but that extension may possibly pay for itself before we are called on, and in the meantime, may keep down the accruing interest; in all events, it will repay the advances we have made. I know that the acquisition of Louisiana has been disapproved by some, from a candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger its union. But who can limit the extent to which the federative principle may operate effectively? The larger our association, the less will it be shaken by local passions; and in any view, is it not better that the opposite bank of the Mississippi should be settled by our own brethren and children, than by strangers of another family? With which shall we be most likely to live in harmony and friendly intercourse?

In matters of religion, I have considered that its free exercise is placed by the Constitution independent of the powers of the general government. I have therefore undertaken, on no occasion, to prescribe the religious exercises suited to it; but have left them, as the Constitution found them, under the direction and discipline of State or Church authorities acknowledged by the several religious societies.

The aboriginal inhabitants of these countries I have regarded with the commiseration their history inspires. Endowed with the faculties and the rights of men, breathing an ardent love of liberty and independence, and occupying a country which left them no desire but to be undisturbed, the stream of overflowing population from other regions directed itself on these shores; without power to divert, or habits to contend against, they have been overwhelmed by the current, or driven before it; now reduced within limits too narrow for the hunter's state, humanity enjoins us to teach them agriculture and the domestic arts; to encourage them to that industry which alone can enable them to maintain their place in existence, and to prepare them in time for that state of society, which to bodily comforts adds the improvement of the mind and morals. We have therefore liberally furnished them with the implements of husbandry and household use; we have placed among them instructors in the arts of first necessity; and they are covered with the ægis of the law against aggressors from among ourselves.

But the endeavors to enlighten them on the fate which awaits their present course of life, to induce them to exercise their reason, follow its dictates, and change their pursuits with the change of circumstances, have powerful obstacles to encounter; they are combated by the habits of their bodies, prejudice of their minds, ignorance, pride, and the influence of interested and crafty individuals among them, who feel themselves something in the present order of things, and fear to become nothing in any other. These persons inculcate a sanctimonious reverence for the customs of their ancestors; that whatsoever they did, must be done through all time; that reason is a false guide, and to advance under its counsel, in their physical, moral, or political condition, is perilous innovation; that their duty is to remain as their Creator made them, ignorance being safety, and knowledge full of danger; in short, my friends, among them is seen the action and counteraction of good sense and bigotry; they, too, have their antiphilosophers, who find an interest in keeping things in their present state, who dread reformation, and exert all their faculties to maintain the ascendency of habit over the duty of improving our reason, and obeying its mandates.

In giving these outlines, I do not mean, fellow citizens, to arrogate to myself the merit of the measures; that is due, in the first place, to the reflecting character of our citizens at large, who, by the weight of public opinion, influence and strengthen the public measures; it is due to the sound discretion with which they select from among themselves those to whom they confide the legislative duties; it is due to the zeal and wisdom of the characters thus selected, who lay the foundations of public happiness in wholesome laws, the execution of which alone remains for others; and it is due to the able and faithful auxiliaries, whose patriotism has associated with me in the executive functions.

During this course of administration, and in order to disturb it, the artillery of the press has been leveled against us, charged with whatsoever its licentiousness could devise or date. These abuses of an institution so important to freedom and science, are deeply to be regretted, inasmuch as they tend to lessen its usefulness, and to sap its safety; they might, indeed, have been corrected by the wholesome punishments reserved and provided by the laws of the several States against falsehood and defamation; but public duties more urgent press on the time of the public servants, and the offenders have therefore been left to find their punishment in the public indignation.

Nor was it uninteresting to the world, that an experiment should be fairly and fully made, whether freedom of discussion unaided by power, is not sufficient for the propagation and protection of truth—whether a government, conducting itself in the true spirit of its constitution, with zeal and purity, and doing no act which it would be unwilling the whole world should witness, can be written down by falsehood and defamation. The experiment has been tried; you have witnessed the scene; our fellow citizens have looked on, cool and collected;

they saw the latent source from which these outrages proceeded; they gathered around their public functionaries, and when the Constitution called them to the decision by suffrage, they pronounced their verdict, honorable to those who had served them, and consolatory to the friend of man, who believes he may be intrusted with his own affairs.

No inference is here intended, that the laws, provided by the State against false and defamatory publications, should not be enforced; he who has time, renders a service to public morals and public tranquillity, in reforming these abuses by the salutary coercions of the law; but the experiment is noted, to prove that, since truth and reason have maintained their ground against false opinions in league with false facts, the press, confined to truth, needs no other legal restraint; the public judgment will correct false reasonings and opinions, on a full hearing of all parties; and no other definite line can be drawn between the inestimable liberty of the press and its demoralizing licentiousness. If there be still improprieties which this rule would not restrain, its supplement must be sought in the censorship of public opinion.

Contemplating the union of sentiment now manifested so generally, as auguring harmony and happiness to our future course, I offer to our country sincere congratulations. With those, too, not yet rallied to the same point, the disposition to do so is gaining strength; facts are piercing through the veil drawn over them; and our doubting brethren will at length see, that the mass of their fellow citizens, with whom they cannot yet resolve to act, as to principles and measures. think as they think, and desire what they desire; that our wish, as well as theirs, is, that the public efforts may be directed honestly to the public good, that peace be cultivated, civil and religious liberty unassailed, law and order preserved. equality of rights maintained, and that state of property, equal or unequal, which results to every man from his own industry, or that of his fathers. When satisfied with these views. it is not in human nature that they should not approve and support them; in the meantime let us cherish then with patient affection; let us do them justice, and more than justice, in all competitions of interest; and we need not doubt that truth, reason, and their own interests will at length prevail, will gather them into the fold of their country, and will complete their entire union of opinion, which gives to a nation the blessing of harmony, and the benefit of all its strength.

I shall now enter on the duties to which my fellow citizens have again called me, and shall proceed in the spirit of those principles which they have approved. I fear not that any motives of interest may lead me astray; I am sensible of no passion which could seduce me knowingly from the path of justice: but the weakness of human nature, and the limits of my own understanding, will produce errors of judgment sometimes injurious to your interests. I shall need, therefore, all the indulgence I have heretofore experienced—the want of it will certainly not lessen with increasing years. I shall need, too, the favor of that Being in whose hands we are, who led our forefathers, as Israel of old, from their native land, and planted them in a country flowing with all the necessaries and comforts of life; who has covered our infancy with his providence, and our riper years with his wisdom and power; and to whose goodness I ask you to join with me in supplications, that he will so enlighten the minds of your servants, guide their councils, and prosper their measures, that whatsoever they do, shall result in your good, and shall secure to you the peace, friendship, and approbation of all nations.

LETTER TO JOHN LANGDON

Paris, September 11, 1785.

DEAR SIR:—Your Captain Yeaton being here, furnishes me an opportunity of paying the tribute of my congratulations on your appointment to the government of your State, which I do sincerely. He gives me the grateful intelligence of your health, and that of Mrs. Langdon. Anxious to promote your service, and believing he could do it by getting himself naturalized here, and authorized to command your vessel, he came from Havre to Paris. But on making the best inquiries I could, it seemed that the time requisite to go through with this business, would be much more than he could spare. He therefore declined it. I wish it were in my power to give you a hope that our commerce, either with this country or its islands, was likely to be put on a better footing. But if it be altered at all, it will probably be for the worse. The regulations respecting their commerce are by no means sufficiently stable to be relied on.

Europe is in quiet, and likely to remain so. The affairs of the Emperor and Dutch are as good as settled, and no other cloud portends any immediate storm. You have heard much of American vessels taken by the Barbary pirates. The Emperor of Morocco took one last winter, (the brig Betsey from Philadelphia) he did not however, reduce the crew to slavery. nor confiscate the vessel or cargo. He has lately delivered up the crew on the solicitation of the Spanish court. No other has ever been taken by them. There are, indeed, rumors of one having been lately taken by the Algerines. The fact is possible, as there is nothing to hinder their taking them, but it is not as yet confirmed. I have little doubt, that we shall be able to place our commerce on a popular footing with the Barbary States, this summer, and thus not only render our navigation to Portugal and Spain safe, but open the Mediterranean as formerly. In spite of treaties, England is still our enemy. Her hatred is deep-rooted and cordial, and nothing is wanting with her but the power to wipe us, and the land we live on, out of existence. Her interest, however, is her ruling passion; and the late American measures have struck at that so vitally, and with an energy, too, of which she had thought us quite incapable, that a possibility seems to open of forming some arrangement with her. When they shall see decidedly, that, without it, we shall suppress their commerce with us, they will be agitated by their avarice, on the one hand, and their hatred and their fear of us, on the other. The result of this conflict of dirty passions is yet to be awaited. The body of the people of this country love us cordially. But ministers and merchants love nobody. The merchants here, are endeavoring to exclude us from their islands. The ministers will be governed in it by political motives, and will do it, or not do it, as these shall appear to dictate, without love or hatred to anybody. It were to be wished that they were able to combine better, the various circumstances which prove, beyond a doubt, that all the advantages of their colonies result. in the end, to the mother country. I pray you to present me in the most friendly terms to Mrs. Langdon, and to be assured of the esteem with which I am, your Excellency's most obedient, and most humble servant.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

ANALYSIS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Newton, Bacon, or Locke; and as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. Hence the common remark of his officers, of the advantage he derived from councils of war, where hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; and certainly no general ever planned his battles more judiciously. deranged during the course of the action, if any member of his plan was dislocated by sudden circumstances, he was slow in re-adjustment. The consequence was, that he often failed in the field, and rarely against an enemy in station, as at Boston and York. He was incapable of fear, meeting personal dangers with the calmest unconcern. Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt, but, when once decided. going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. He was, indeed, in every sense of the words, a wise, a good, and a great man. His temper was naturally irritable and high toned; but reflection and resolution had obtained a firm and habitual ascendency over it. If ever, however, it broke its bonds, he was most tremendous in his wrath. In his expenses he was honorable, but exact; liberal in contributions to whatever promised utility; but frowning and unvielding on all visionary projects, and all unworthy calls on his charity. His heart was not warm in its affections; but he exactly calculated every man's value, and gave him a solid esteem proportioned to it. His person, you know, was fine, his stature exactly what one would wish, his deportment easy, erect and noble; the best horseman of his age, and the most graceful figure that could be seen on horseback. Although in the circle of his friends, where he might be unreserved with safety, he took a free share in conversation, his colloquial talents were not above mediocrity, possessing neither copiousness of ideas, nor fluency of words. In public when called on for a sudden opinion, he was unready, short and embarrassed. Yet he wrote readily, rather diffusely, in an easy and correct style. This he had acquired by conversation with the world, for his education was merely reading, writing and common arithmetic to which he added surveying at a later day. His time was employed in action chiefly, reading little, and that only in agriculture and English history. His correspondence became necessarily extensive, and, with journalizing his agricultural proceedings, occupied most of his leisure hours within doors. On the whole, his character was, in its mass, perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent; and it may truly be said, that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance. For his was the singular destiny and merit, of leading the armies of his country successfully through an arduous war, for the establishment of its independence, of conducting its councils through the birth of a government, new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train; and of scrupulously obeying the laws through the whole of his career, civil and military, of which the history of the world furnishes no other example.

TRIBUTE TO FRIENDSHIP

Letter to Maria Cosway.

Paris, October 12, 1786.

My DEAR MADAM :- Having performed the last sad office of handing you into your carriage, at the pavillon de St. Denis. and seen the wheels get actually into motion, I turned on my heel and walked, more dead than alive, to the opposite door, where my own was awaiting me. Mr. Danquerville was missing. He was sought for, found, and dragged down stairs. We were crammed into the carriage, like recruits for the Bastille, and not having soul enough to give orders to the coachman, he presumed Paris our destination, and drove off. After a considerable interval, silence was broke, with a "Je suis vraiment affligé du départ de ces bons gens." This was a signal for a mutual confession of distress. We began immediately to talk of Mr. and Mrs. Cosway, of their goodness, their talents, their amiability; and, though we spoke of nothing else, we seemed hardly to have entered into the matter, when the coachman announced the rue St. Denis, and that we were opposite Mr. Danquerville's. He insisted on descending there. and traversing a short passage to his lodgings. I was carried home. Seated by my fireside, solitary and sad, the following dialogue took place between my Head and my Heart:

Head. Well, friend, you seem to be in a pretty trim.

Heart. I am indeed the most wretched of all earthly beings. Overwhelmed with grief, every fibre of my frame distended beyond its natural powers to bear, I would willingly meet whatever catastrophe should leave me no more to feel, or to fear.

Head. These are the eternal consequences of your warmth and precipitation. This is one of the scrapes into which you are ever leading us. You confess your follies, indeed; but still you hug and cherish them; and no reformation can be hoped where there is no repentance.

Heart. Oh, my friend! this is no moment to upbraid my foibles. I am rent into fragments by the force of my grief! If you have any balm, pour it into my wounds; if none, do not harrow them by new torments. Spare me in this awful view to learn from you what America is doing. Let us return, then, to our point. I wish to make you sensible how imprudent it is to place your affections, without reserve, on objects you must so soon lose, and whose loss, when it comes, must cost you such severe pangs. Remember the last night. You knew your friends were to leave Paris to-day. This was enough to throw you into agonies. All night you tossed us from one side of the bed to the other; no sleep, no rest. The poor crippled wrist, too, never left one moment in the same position; now up, now down, now here, now there; was it to be wondered at, if its pains returned? The surgeon then was to be called, and to be rated as an ignoramus, because he could not divine the cause of this extraordinary change. In fine, my friend, you must mend your manners. This is not a world to live at random in, as you do. To avoid those eternal distresses, to which you are forever exposing us, you must learn to look forward, before you take a step which may interest our peace. Everything in this world is matter of calculation. Advance then with caution, the balance in your hand. Put into one scale the pleasures which any object may offer; but put fairly into the other, the pains which are to follow, and see which preponderates. The making an acquaintance, is not a matter of indifference. When a new one is proposed to you, view it all round. Consider what advantages it presents, and to what inconveniences it may expose you. Do not bite at the bait of pleasure, till you know there is no hook beneath it. The art of life is the art of avoiding pain; and he is the best pilot, who steers clearest of the rocks and shoals with which it is beset. Pleasure is always before us; but misfortune is at our side; while running after that, this arrests us. The most effectual means of being secure against pain, is to retire within ourselves, and to suffice for our own happiness. Those which depend on ourselves, are the only pleasures a wise man will count on; for nothing is ours, which another may deprive us of. Hence the inestimable value of intellectual pleasures. Ever in our power, always leading us to something new, never cloving, we ride serene and sublime above the concerns of this mortal world, contemplating truth and nature, matter and motion, the laws which bind up their existence, and that Eternal Being who made and bound them up by those laws. Let this be our employ. Leave the bustle and tumult of society to those who have not talents to occupy themselves without them. Friendship is but another name for an alliance with the follies and the misfortunes of others. Our own share of miseries is sufficient: why enter then as volunteers into those of another? Is there so little gall poured into our cup, that we must need help to drink that of our neighbor? A friend dies, or leaves us: we feel as if a limb was cut off. He is sick: we must watch over him, and participate of his pains. His fortune is shipwrecked: ours must be laid under contribution. He loses a child, a parent, or a partner: we must mourn the loss as if it were our own.

Heart. And what more sublime delight than to mingle tears with one whom the hand of heaven hath smitten! to watch over the bed of sickness, and to beguile its tedious and its painful moments! to share our bread with one to whom misfortune has left none! This world abounds indeed with misery; to lighten its burthen, we must divide it with one another. But let us now try the virtue of your mathematical balance, and as you have put into one scale the burthens of friendship, let me put its comforts into the other. When languishing then under disease, how grateful is the solace of our friends! how are we penetrated with their assiduities and attentions! how much are we supported by their encouragements and kind offices! When heaven has taken from us some object of our love, how sweet is it to have a bosom whereon to recline our heads, and into which we may pour the torrent of our tears! Grief, with such a comfort, is almost a luxury! In a life, where we are perpetually exposed to want and accident, yours is a wonderful proposition, to insulate ourselves, to retire from all aid, and to wrap ourselves in the mantle of selfsufficiency! For, assuredly, nobody will care for him who cares for nobody. But friendship is precious, not only in the shade, but in the sunshine of life; and thanks to a benevolent arrangement of things, the greater part of life is sunshine. I will recur for proof to the days we have lately passed. On these, indeed, the sun shone brightly. How gay did the face of nature appear! Hills, valleys, châteaux, gardens, rivers, every object wore its liveliest hue! Whence did they borrow it? From the presence of our charming companion. They were pleasing because she seemed pleased. Alone, the scene would have been dull and insipid: the participation of it with her gave it relish. Let the gloomy monk, sequestered from the world, seek unsocial pleasures in the bottom of his cell! Let the sublimated philosopher grasp visionary happiness, while pursuing phantoms dressed in the garb of truth! Their supreme wisdom is supreme folly; and they mistake for happiness the mere absence of pain. Had they ever felt the solid pleasure of one generous spasm of the heart, they would exchange for it all the frigid speculations of their lives, which you have been vaunting in such elevated terms. Believe me, then, my friend, that that is a miserable arithmetic which could estimate friendship at nothing, or at less than nothing. Respect for you has induced me to enter into this discussion, and to hear principles uttered which I detest and abjure. Respect for myself now obliges me to recall you into the proper limits of your office. When nature assigned us the same habitation, she gave us over it a divided empire. To you, she allotted the field of science; to me, that of morals. When the circle is to be squared, or the orbit of a comet to be traced; when the arch of greatest strength, or the solid of least resistance, is to be investigated, take up the problem; it is yours; nature has given me no cognizance of it. In like manner in denying to you the feelings of sympathy, of benevolence, of gratitude, of justice, of love, of friendship, she has excluded you from their control. To these, she has adapted the mechanism of the heart. Morals were too essential to the happiness of man, to be risked on the uncertain combinations of the head. She laid their foundation, therefore, in sentiment, not in science. That she gave to all, as necessary to all; this to a few only, as sufficing with a few. I know, indeed, that you pretend authority to the sovereign control of our conduct, in all its parts; and a respect for your grave saws and maxims, a desire to do what is right, has sometimes induced me to conform to your counsels. A few facts, however, which I can readily recall to your memory, will suffice to prove to you that pature has not organized you for our moral direction. When the poor, wearied soldier whom we overtook at Chickahominy. with his pack on his back, begged us to let him get up behind our chariot, you began to calculate that the road was full of soldiers, and that if all should be taken up, our horses would fail in their journey. We drove on therefore. But, soon, becoming sensible you had made me do wrong, that, though we cannot relieve all the distressed, we should relieve as many as we can, I turned about to take up the soldier; but he had entered a byepath, and was no more to be found; and from that moment to this, I could never find him out, to ask his forgiveness. Again, when the poor woman came to ask a charity in Philadelphia, you whispered that she looked like a drunkard, and that half a dollar was enough to give her for the ale-house. Those who want the dispositions to give, easily find reasons why they ought not to give. When I sought her out afterwards, and did what I should have done at first, you know that she employed the money immediately towards placing her child at school. If our country, when pressed with wrongs at the point of the bayonet, had been governed by its heads instead of its hearts, where should we have been now? Hanging on a gallows as high as Haman's. You began to calculate, and to compare wealth and numbers; we threw up a few pulsations of our blood; we supplied enthusiasm against wealth and numbers; we put our existence to the hazard, when the hazard seemed against us, and we saved our country: justifying, at the same time, the ways of Providence, whose precept is, to do always what is right, and leave the issue to Him. In short, my friend, as far as my recollection serves me, I do not know that I ever did a good thing on your suggestion, or a dirty one without it. I do forever, then, disclaim your interference in my province. Fill paper as you please with triangles and squares; try how many ways you can hang and combine them together. I shall never envy nor control your sublime delights. But leave me to decide, when and where friendships are to be contracted. You say, I contract them at random. So you said the woman at Philadelphia was a drunkard. I receive none into my esteem, till I know they are worthy of it. Wealth, title, office, are no recommendations to my friendship. On the contrary, great good qualities are requisite to make amends for their having wealth, title, and office. You confess, that, in the present case, I could not have made a worthier choice. You only object, that I was so soon to lose them. We are not immortal ourselves, my friend; how can we expect our enjoyments to be so? We have no rose without its thorn; no pleasure without alloy. It is the law of our existence; and we must acquiesce. It is the condition annexed to all our pleasure, not by us who receive, but by him who gives them. True, this condition is pressing cruelly on me at this moment. I feel more fit for death than life. But, when I look back on the pleasures of which it is the consequence, I am conscious they were worth the price I am paying. Notwithstanding your endeavors, too, to damp my hopes, I comfort myself with expectations of their promised return. Hope is sweeter than despair; and they were too good to mean to deceive me. "In the summer," said the gentleman; but "in the spring," said the lady; and I should love her forever, were it only for that! Know, then, my friend, that I have taken these good people into my bosom; that I have lodged them in the warmest cell I could find; that I love them, and will continue to love them through life; that if fortune should dispose them on one side the globe, and me on the other, my affections shall pervade its whole mass to reach them. Knowing then my determination, attempt not to disturb it. If you can, at any time, furnish matter for their amusement, it will be the office of a good neighbor to do it. I will, in like manner, seize any occasion which may offer, to do the like good turn for you with Condorcet, Rittenhouse, Madison, La Cretelle, or any other of those worthy sons of science, whom you so justly prize.

I thought this a favorable proposition whereon to rest the issue of the dialogue. So I put an end to it by calling for my nightcap. Methinks, I hear you wish to heaven I had called a little sooner, and so spared you the ennui of such a sermon. I did not interrupt them sooner, because I was in a mood for hearing sermons. You too were the subject; and on such a thesis I never think the theme long; not even if I am to write it, and that slowly and awkwardly, as now, with the left hand. But, that you may not be discouraged from a correspondence which begins so formidably, I will promise you, on my honor, that my future letters shall be of a reasonable length. I will even agree to express but half my esteem for you, for fear of cloying you with too full a dose. But, on your part, no curtailing. If your letters are as long as the Bible, they will appear short to me. Only let them be brimful of affection. I shall read them with the dispositions with which Arlequin, in Les deux billets, spelt the words "je t'aime," and wished that the whole alphabet had entered into their composition.

We have had incessant rains since your departure. These make me fear for your health, as well as that you had an uncomfortable journey. The same cause has prevented me from being able to give you any account of your friends here. This voyage to Fontainebleau will probably send the Count de Moutier and the Marquis de Brehan to America. Danquerville promised to visit me, but has not done it as yet. De la Tude comes sometimes to take family soup with me, and entertains me with anecdotes of his five and thirty years' imprisonment. How fertile is the mind of man, which can make the Bastille and dungeon of Vincennes yield interesting anecdotes! You know this was for making four verses on Madame de Pompadour. But I think you told me you did not know the verses. They were these: "Sans esprit, sans sentiment, Sans être belle, ni neuve, En France on peut avoir le premier amant: Pompadour en est l'épreuve." I have read the memoir of his three escapes. As to myself, my health is good, except my wrist which mends slowly, and my mind, which mends not at all, but broods constantly over your departure. The lateness of the season obliges me to decline my journey into the south of France. Present me in the most friendly terms to Mr. Cosway, and receive me into your own recollection with a partiality and warmth, proportioned not to my own poor merit, but to the sentiments of sincere affection and esteem, with which I have the honor to be, my dear Madam, your most obedient humble servant.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

LETTER TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF VIRGINIA

Washington, February 16, 1809.

I RECEIVE with peculiar sensibility the affectionate address of the General Assembly of my native State, on my approaching retirement from the office with which I have been honored by the nation at large. Having been one of those who entered into public life at the commencement of an era the most extraordinary which the history of man has ever yet presented to his contemplation, I claim nothing more, for the part I have acted in it, than a common merit of having, with others, faithfully endeavored to do my duty in the several stations allotted me. In the measures which you are pleased particularly to approve, I have been aided by the wisdom and patriotism of the national legislature, and the talents and virtues of the able coadjutors with whom it has been my happiness to be associated, and to whose valuable and faithful services I with pleasure and gratitude bear witness.

From the moment that to preserve our rights a change of government became necessary, no doubt could be entertained that a republican form was most consonant with reason, with right, with the freedom of man, and with the character and situation of our fellow citizens. To the sincere spirit of republicanism are naturally associated the love of country, devotion to its liberty, its rights, and its honor. Our preference to that form of government has been so far justified by its success, and the prosperity with which it has blessed us. In no portion of the earth were life, liberty and property ever so securely held; and it is with infinite satisfaction that withdrawing from the active scenes of life, I see the sacred design of these blessings committed to those who are sensible of their value and determined to defend them.

It would have been a great consolation to have left the nation under the assurance of continued peace. Nothing has been spared to effect it; and at no other period of history would such efforts have failed to ensure it. For neither belligerent pretends to have been injured by us, or can say that we have in any instance departed from the most faithful neutrality; and certainly none will charge us with a want of forbearance.

In the desire of peace, but in full confidence of safety from our unity, our position and our resources, I shall retire into the bosom of my native State, endeared to me by every tie which can attach the human heart. The assurances of your approbation, and that my conduct has given satisfaction to my fellow citizens generally, will be an important ingredient in my future happiness; and that the Supreme Ruler of the universe may have our country under His special care, will be among the latest of my prayers.

THE UNION OF THE SHENANDOAH AND THE POTOMAC

THE passage of the Potomac through the Blue Ridge is. perhaps, one of the most stupendous scenes in nature. You stand on a very high point of land. On your right comes up the Shenandoah, having ranged along the foot of the mountain an hundred miles to seek a vent. On your left approaches the Potomac, in quest of a passage also. In the moment of their junction, they rush together against the mountain, rend it asunder, and pass off to the sea. The first glance of this scene hurries our senses into the opinion, that this earth has been created in time, that the mountains were formed first, that the rivers began to flow afterwards, that in this place, particularly, they have been dammed up by the Blue Ridge of mountains, and have formed an ocean, which filled the whole valley; that continuing to rise they have at length broken over at this spot, and have torn the mountain down from its summit to its base. The piles of rock on each hand, but particularly on the Shenandoah, the evident marks of their disrupture and avulsion from their beds by the most powerful agents of nature, corroborate the impression. But the distant finishing which nature has given to the picture, is of a very different character. It is a true contrast to the foreground. It is as placid and delightful as that is wild and tremendous. For the mountain being cloven asunder, she presents to your eye, through the cleft, a small patch of smooth blue horizon, at an infinite distance in the plain country, inviting you as it were, from the riot and tumult roaring around to pass through the breach and participate of the calm below.

Here the eye ultimately composes itself; and that way, too, the road happens actually to lead. You cross the Potomac above the junction, pass along its side through the base of the mountain for three miles, its terrible precipices hanging in fragments over you, and within about twenty miles reach Fredericktown, and the fine country round that. This scene is worth a voyage across the Atlantic. Yet here, as in the neighborhood of the Natural Bridge, are people who have passed their lives within half a dozen miles, and have never been to survey these monuments of a war between rivers and mountains, which must have shaken the earth itself to its centre.

FROM THE REPORT TO THE PRESIDENT AND DIRECTORS OF THE LITERARY FUND

In the same report of the commissioners of 1818 it was stated by them that "in conformity with the principles of constitution, which place all sects of religion on an equal footing, with the jealousies of the different sects in guarding that equality from encroachment or surprise, and with the sentiments of the Legislature in freedom of religion, manifested on former occasions, they had not proposed that any professorship of divinity should be established in the University; that provision, however, was made for giving instruction in the Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages, the depositories of the originals, and of the earliest and most respected authorities of the faith of every sect, and for courses of ethical lectures developing those moral obligations in which all sects agree. That, proceeding thus far, without offence to the constitution, they had left, at this point, to every sect to take into their own hands the office of further instruction in the peculiar tenet of each."

It was not, however, to be understood that instruction in religious opinion and duties was meant to be precluded by the public authorities, as indifferent to the interests of society. On the contrary, the relations which exist between man and his Maker, and the duties resulting from those relations, are the most interesting and important to every human being, and the most incumbent on his study and investigation. The want of instruction in the various creeds of religious faith existing among our citizens presents, therefore, a chasm in a general institution of the useful sciences. But it was thought that this want, and the entrustment to each society of instruction in its own doctrine, were evils of less danger than a permission to the public authorities to dictate modes or principles of religious instruction, or than opportunities furnished them by giving countenance or ascendency to any one sect over another. A remedy, however, has been suggested of promising aspect, which, while it excludes the public authorities from the domain of religious freedom, will give to the sectarian schools of divinity the full benefit the public provisions made for instruction in the other branches of science. These branches are equally necessary to the divine as to the other professional or civil characters, to enable them to fulfill the duties of their calling with understanding and usefulness. It has, therefore, been in contemplation, and suggested by some pious individuals, who perceive the advantages of associating other studies with those of religion, to establish their religious schools on the confines of the University, so as to give to their students ready and convenient access and attendance on the scientific lectures of the University; and to maintain, by that means, those destined for the religious professions on as high a standing of science, and of personal weight and respectability, as may be obtained by others from the benefits of the University. Such establishments would offer the further and greater advantage of enabling the students of the University to attend religious exercises with the professor of their particular sect, either in the rooms of the building still to be erected, and destined to that purpose under impartial regulations, as proposed in the same report of the commissioners, or in the lecturing room of such professor. To such propositions the visitors are disposed to lend a willing ear, and would think it their duty to give every encouragement, by assuring to those who might choose such a location for their schools, that the regulations of the University should be so modified and accommodated as to give every facility of access and attendance to their students, with such regulated use also as may be permitted to the other students, of the library which may hereafter be acquired, either by public or private munificence. But always understanding that these schools shall be independent of the University and of each other. Such an arrangement would complete the circle of the useful sciences embraced by this institution, and would fill the chasm now existing, on principles which would leave inviolate the constitutional freedom of religion, the most inalienable and sacred of all human rights, over which the people and authorities of this State, individually and publicly, have ever manifested the most watchful jealousy; and could this jealousy now be alarmed, in the opinion of the Legislature, by what is here suggested, the idea will be relinquished on any surmise of disapprobation which they might think proper to express.

A GLIMPSE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

From the 'Autobiography.'

THE King was now become a passive machine in the hands of the National Assembly, and had he been left to himself he would have willingly acquiesced in whatever they should devise as best for the nation. A wise constitution would have been formed, hereditary in his line, himself placed at its head, with powers so large as to enable him to do all the good of his station, and so limited, as to restrain him from its abuse. This he would have faithfully administered, and more than this, I do not believe, he ever wished. But he had a Queen of absolute sway over his weak mind and timid virtue, and of a character the reverse of his in all points. This angel, as gaudily painted in the rhapsodies of Burke, with some smartness of fancy, but no sound sense, was proud, disdainful of restraint, indignant at all obstacles to her will, eager in the pursuit of pleasure, and firm enough to hold to her desires, or perish in their wreck. Her inordinate gambling and dissipations, with those of the Count d'Artois and others of her clique, had been a sensible item in the exhaustion of the treasury, which called into action the reforming hand of the nation; and her opposition to it, her inflexible perverseness, and dauntless spirit, led herself to the Guillotine, drew the King on with her, and plunged the world into crimes and calamities which will forever stain the pages of modern history. I have ever believed that, had there been no Queen, there would have been no revolution. No force would have been provoked, nor exercised. The King would have gone hand in hand with the wisdom of his sounder counsellors, who, guided by the increased lights of the age, wished only, with the same pace, to advance the principles of their social constitution. The deed which closed the mortal course of these sovereigns, I shall neither approve nor condemn. I am not prepared to say that the first magistrate of a nation cannot commit treason against his country, or is unamenable to its punishment; nor yet, that where there is no written law, no regulated tribunal, there is not a law in our hearts, and a power in our hands, given for righteous employment in maintaining right, and redressing wrong. Of those who judged the King, many thought him wilfully criminal; many, that his existence would keep the nation in perpetual conflict with the horde of kings who would war against a generation which might come home to themselves, and that it were better that one should die than all. I should not have voted with this portion of the Legislature. I should have shut up the Queen in a convent, putting harm out of her power, and placed the King in his station, investing him with limited powers, which, I verily believe, he would have honestly exercised, according to the measure of his understanding. In this way, no void would have been created, courting the usurpation of a military adventurer, nor occasion given for those enormities which demoralized the nations of the world, and destroyed, and are yet to destroy, millions and millions of its inhabitants.

lions of its inhabitants.

And here, I cannot leave this great and good country without expressing my sense of its preëminence of character among the nations of the earth. A more benevolent people I have never known, nor greater warmth and devotedness in their select friendships. Their kindness and accommodation to strangers is unparalleled, and the hospitality of Paris is beyond anything I had conceived to be practicable in a large city. Their eminence, too, in science, the communicative dispositions of their scientific men, the politeness of the general manners, the ease and vivacity of their conversation, give a charm to their society, to be found nowhere else. In a comparison of this, with other countries, we have the proof of primacy, which was given to Themistocles, after the battle of Salamis. Every general voted to himself the first reward of valor, and the second to Themistocles. So, ask the traveled inhabitant of any nation, in what country on earth would you rather live? Certainly, in my own, where are all my friends, my relations, and the earliest and sweetest affections and recollections of my life. Which would be your second choice? France.

LETTER TO PETER CARR

From the 'Autobiography.'

Paris, August 19, 1785.

DEAR PETER:—I received, by Mr. Mazzei, your letter of April the twentieth. I am much mortified to hear that you have lost so much time; and that, when you arrived in Williamsburg, you were not at all advanced from what you were when you left Monticello. Time now begins to be precious to you. Every day you lose will retard a day your entrance on that public stage whereon you may begin to be useful to yourself. However, the way to repair the loss is to improve the future time. I trust, that with your disposition, even the acquisition of science is a pleasing employment. I can assure you, that the possession of it is, what (next to an honest heart) will above all things render you dear to your friends, and give you fame and promotion in your own country. When your mind shall be well improved with science, nothing will be necessary to place you in the highest points of view, but to pursue the interests of your country, the interests of your friends, and your own interests also, with the purest integrity, the most chaste honor. The defect of these virtues can never be made up by all the other acquirements of body and mind. Make these, then, your first object. Give up money, give up fame, give up science, give the earth itself and all it contains, rather than do an immoral act. And never suppose that in any possible situation, or under any circumstances, it is best for you to do a dishonorable thing, however slightly so it may appear to you. Whenever you are to do a thing, though it can never be known but to yourself, ask yourself how you would act were all the world looking at you, and act accordingly. Encourage all your virtuous dispositions, and exercise them whenever an opportunity arises; being assured that they will gain strength by exercise, as a limb of the body does, and that exercise will make them habitual. From the practice of the purest virtue, you may be assured you will derive the most sublime comforts in every moment of life, and in the moment of death. If ever you find yourself environed with difficulties and perplexing circumstances, out of which you are at a loss how to extricate yourself, do what is right, and be assured that that will extricate you the best way out of the worst situations. Though you cannot see, when you take one step, what will be the next, yet follow truth, justice, and plain dealing, and never fear their leading you out of the labyrinth, in the easiest manner possible. The knot which you thought a Gordian one, will untie itself before you. Nothing is so mistaken as the supposition, that a person is to extricate himself from a difficulty, by intrigue, by chicanery, by dissimulation, by trimming, by an untruth, by an injustice. This increases the difficulties tenfold; and those, who pursue these methods, get themselves so involved at length, that they can turn no way but their infamy becomes more exposed. It is of great importance to set a resolution, not to be shaken, never to tell an untruth. There is no vice so mean, so pitiful, so contemptible; and he who permits himself to tell a lie once, finds it much easier to do it a second and third time, till at length it becomes habitual; he tells lies without attending to it, and truths without the world's believing him. This falsehood of the tongue leads to that of the heart, and in time depraves all its good dispositions.

LETTER TO JOHN ADAMS, RECALLING THEIR LONG FRIENDSHIP

Monticello, October 12, 1823.

. . . Putting aside these things, however, for the present. I write this letter as due to a friendship coeval with our government, and now attempted to be poisoned, when too late in life to be replaced by new affections. I had for some time observed in the public papers, dark hints and mysterious innuendoes of a correspondence of yours with a friend, to whom you had opened your bosom without reserve, and which was to be made public by that friend or his representative. And now it is said to be actually published. It has not yet reached us, but extracts have been given, and such as seemed most likely to draw a curtain of separation between you and myself. Were there no other motive than that of indignation against the author of this outrage on private confidence, whose shaft seems to have been aimed at yourself more particularly, this would make it the duty of every honorable mind to disappoint that aim, by opposing to its impression a seven-fold shield of apathy and insensibility. With me, however, no such armor is needed. The circumstances of the times in which we have happened to live, and the partiality of our friends at a particular period, placed us in a state of apparent opposition, which some might suppose to be personal also; and there might not be wanting those who wished to make it so, by filling our ears with malignant falsehoods, by dressing up hideous phantoms of their own creation, presenting them to you under my name, to me under yours, and endeavoring to instil into our minds things concerning each other the most destitute of truth. And if there had been, at any time, a moment when we were off our guard, and in a temper to let the whispers of these people make us forget what we had known of each other for so many years, and years of so much trial, yet all men who have attended to the workings of the human mind, who have seen the false colors under which passion sometimes dresses the actions and motives of others, have seen also those passions subsiding with time and reflection, dissipating like mists before the rising sun, and restoring to us the sight of all things in their true shape and colors. It would be strange, indeed, if, at our years, we were to go back an age to hunt up imaginary or forgotten facts, to disturb the repose of affections so sweetening to the evening of our lives. Be assured, my dear sir, that I am incapable of receiving the slightest impression from the effort now made to plant thorns on the pillow of age, worth and wisdom, and to sow tares between friends who have been such for near half a century. Beseeching you, then, not to suffer your mind to be disquieted by this wicked attempt to poison its peace, and praying you to throw it by among the things which have never happened, I add sincere assurances of my unabated and constant attachment, friendship, and respect.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

"The Unanimous Declaration of the Thirteen United States of America."
[Written by Thomas Jefferson. After certain amendments, adopted in its present form by the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled at Philadelphia, on Thursday, 4 July, 1776.]

When, in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the Powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights; that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness. That, to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such Principles, and organizing its Powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to affect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly, all experience has shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But, when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world:

He has refused his Assent to Laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature; a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their Public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time after such dissolutions to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative Powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the Population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws for Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

He has obstructed the Administration of Justice by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary Powers.

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and Payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harrass our People and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of Peace, Standing Armies, without the Consent of our legislatures.

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to, the Civil Power.

He has combined with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their Acts of pretended Legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us;

For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from Punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States;

For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world; For imposing Taxes on us without our Consent:

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury:

For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences:

For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighboring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies;

For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering, fundamentally, the Forms of our Governments;

For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with Power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated Government here by declaring us out of his Protection, and waging War against us. He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the Lives of our People.

He is, at this time, transporting large Armies of foreign Mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty and Perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow Citizens, taken Captive on the High Seas, to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these Oppressions, We have Petitioned for Redress, in the most humble terms; Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free People.

Nor have We been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts by their Legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind—Enemies in War—in Peace, Friends.

WE, THEREFORE, THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, IN GENERAL CONGRESS ASSEMBLED, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, Do, in the Name and by the Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly Publish and Declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be, Free and Independent States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connexion between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do. And, for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the Protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor.

ANDREW JOHNSON

[1808-1875]

THE subject of this sketch was born in the city of Raleigh, North Carolina, December 29, 1808. His father, Jacob Johnson, was then a hostler for Tasso's Tavern, and he and his wife, being dependent and unlettered, readily consented to the naming of the boy by a daughter of Mr. Tasso, afterward Mrs. Hannah Stuart. It has been said that she named him for Andrew Jackson, who even then had become a popular hero. There is no evidence that Andrew Johnson was baptized by any name, whether as an infant or in after life; and if he was ever called by the full name of "Old Hickory," he dropped the middle name before he became a public man.

While some of the family of Jacob Johnson, the father, were degraded as well as poor, the following testimony was borne of him, after his death, by the editor of the Raleigh Star, in its issue of January 12, 1812: "Although for many years Jacob Johnson had occupied but an humble station, in his last illness he was visited by the principal inhabitants of the city, by whom he was esteemed for his honesty, sobriety, industry and humane friendly disposition. Among all by whom he was known and esteemed none lament him more, except perhaps his own relatives, than the publisher of this paper; for he owes his life on a particular occasion to the kindness and humanity of Johnson." This act of humanity was, doubtless, his saving the publisher from drowning, with some risk of his own life. The testimony of an intelligent countryman of the neighborhood was to the effect that Mrs. Jacob Johnson, though of humble origin, was an honest, good woman.

Andrew was just three years old when his father died. There were no free schools in Raleigh in those days, and when he became old enough to go to school, his mother was unable to pay for his tuition; and, that he might not grow up in idleness, when he arrived at the age of ten years, she had him apprenticed to a tailor named Selby. The post-office was kept in or near the tailor-shop, and the young apprentice soon began to profit by the conversation of educated men and youths, who dropped in for or with their mail. One of the latter, Johnson's senior by a few years, noticed his eagerness in listening to anyone who would read aloud in the office, regaled him with specimens of eloquence from the 'Columbian Orator,' and afterward gave him the book. This young benefactor was William G. Hill, who became a leading physician of Raleigh in the last generation; and it is said that the apprentice learned to read from the book so given, some one teaching him the letters. When he was about sixteen years old, he and a few heedless companions got into trouble by rocking the house of a disreputable old woman, and to avoid threatened prosecution he ran away. With a scant change of clothes in a little handbag, he made his way on foot to Laurens Court House, South Carolina, and there he supported himself awhile by working at his trade. Young Johnson returned to Raleigh in about two years, and after a short sojourn, in May, 1826, left the old home, not to revisit it for more than two-score years. He, his mother, and stepfather loaded their earthly possessions in a twowheeled cart, to which was hitched a blind pony, and proceeded to make a long journey across the mountains, to Greenville, Tennessee; and there Andrew Johnson made his home for nearly all the rest of his life. His mother's health was probably undermined by the wearisome journey and its exposures, and she soon died. At all events, history is thereafter silent about her. Settling in Greenville, young Johnson obtained employment in the tailoring business, and soon married Eliza McCardle, a young woman whose advantages and social position were superior to his. She was helpmate for him and taught him to write.

So much has been said of the origin and early years of Andrew Johnson, that it must be apparent what strength of mind and will he had to rise from such beginnings and surroundings, overcoming all obstacles, to the highest elective office on earth. That Johnson must have used the spare hours from his trade and his evenings in reading good literature is proved by the fact that in a few years he had acquired a vocabulary and style, in speaking and writing, which made him the peer in debate of the many great orators of which his adopted State was justly proud. His native ability was soon recognized at his new home, and in 1829, before he was of age, and again in 1830, he was elected one of the aldermen of the town. In the latter year he was advanced to its mayoralty. In the year following, by the election of the county court, he was chosen a trustee of a public academy. Bent upon availing himself of every opportunity to improve, he obtained permission to participate in the debates of a literary society of the College of Greenville. In that he laid the foundation of his readiness and force as a debater, which were exhibited when, at the age of twenty-five, in the year 1834, he canvassed and won a seat in the Legislature.

In 1840 his prominence had become such that his party made him a candidate for elector for the State-at-large on the Van Buren ticket. From 1843, for ten years by successive elections, he was a member of the House of Representatives in the National Legislature. His powers as a popular orator being recognized throughout the State. his party gave him the nomination for Governor in 1853 and 1855. He was triumphantly elected, and on the expiration of his second term as Governor, in 1857, he was elected by the Legislature to the United States Senate; and he continued to be a member of that body until March 4, 1862, when he was appointed by President Lincoln Military Governor of Tennessee. In his canvasses for the office of Governor in 1853 and 1855, and in his messages to the Legislature when Governor, he advocated measures favoring "the working people"; so that he was often called "the Mechanic Governor." As if to give color to his reputation as such, he is said to have lived part of the time, while he was in executive office, over a livery stable in Nashville. In the United States Senate he was a strenuous advocate of a liberal homestead bill, and in May, 1858. he made a speech on the subject which gave him a national reputation. He was also a strong advocate of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. of which Stephen A. Douglas was the champion. The Senate then contained many great men, such as Seward, Fessenden, Sumner, Edwards, Trumbull, Chase, and Wade of the North, and Davis, Toombs, Benjamin, and Wigfall of the South, and Johnson proved himself to be the peer of the best of them in debate. When the question of the secession was the paramount issue in the Senate and before the country, in 1860, he made a great speech from his seat on the side of the Union. His decided stand on this subject made him unpopular with the extremists of the South, while his insistence on slavery as an institution guaranteed by the Constitution, with right in the slave owners to carry slave property into the territories, prevented his being classed with the Republicans. was the only member of Congress from either house from the South who retained his seat after his State adopted the ordinance of secession; even most of those of the border States, Kentucky and Missouri, resigned their seats and did what they could for the Confederate cause. Under these circumstances Johnson was a very prominent figure during the war, and it was natural for the President to appoint him Military Governor of Tennessee, after the fall of Forts Henry and Donelson, in February, 1862, had opened the way for the Union armies to take possession of Nashville. pointed March fourth, on the eighth day thereafter he assumed the duties of the office, and proceeded to make himself felt in behalf of the Union. He built a railroad from Nashville to the Tennessee River, made speeches in all parts of the State which were accessible to him, issued a proclamation confiscating property of rich Confederates, and raised twenty-five regiments in Tennessee for service in the Union army. As that State was then the storm center of the war in the West, these services of the Military Governor were of immense value to the side which he had so zealously espoused. On this account some assert that no man did more for the triumph of the Union cause than he. These services were recognized by the Republican party, and for their influence on the border States, and otherwise, he was selected as the candidate for Vice-president, with Mr. Lincoln at the head of the ticket, in 1864. In his letter of acceptance of the nomination he asserted himself still to be a Democrat; but said that the cause of the Union was superior to all other considerations.

Elected Vice-president, and Mr. Lincoln being assassinated within six weeks after the inauguration, Mr. Johnson became President of the United States. He was sworn in at his hotel, the Kirkwood House, at eleven o'clock A.M., April 15, 1865, in the presence of members of the Cabinet and a few other leading men, Chief Justice Chase administering the oath of office. He thus obtained the acme of his vaulting ambition, at the age of fifty-six years. Unless he delighted in strife, however, his nearly four years of service must have been the least happy of his public life.

Mr. Lincoln having been shot about ten o'clock the night before, and his great soul having left his body about seven in the morning, Johnson had but a few hours for the preparation of his brief inaugural address, printed in full on page 2732. It may not be in his best style, but it is an indication of his character and egotism. Senator John P. Hale of New Hampshire, who was present at its delivery, wittily remarked: "Johnson seemed willing to share the glory of his achievements with his Creator, but he utterly forgot that Mr. Lincoln had any share of credit in the suppression of the rebellion."

He retained the Cabinet of his predecessor, and for a time made no changes, though soon a violent enmity arose between him and Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War. His ideas about the reconstruction of the Union were substantially the same as those of Mr. Lincoln, who doubtless approved the terms of surrender of Johnson to Sherman. His first message to Congress, on its assembling December 4, 1865, sets forth his convictions on this subject, and presents the argument against the right of secession very forcibly. That message is in the best style of his speeches on the Union of the States, and is probably the best composition which came from his pen. The extracts that are given from this message present his argument and show with what force and correctness this self-taught man could express himself.

Johnson strongly insisted that the States should regulate suffrage according to their own will. Very soon thereafter the differences between the President and Congress on this question, and others analogous, became irreconcilable. He proceeded to veto such bills in reference to former slaves and to reconstruction as were inconsistent with his own plans. Among these was the bill continuing the Freedmen's Bureau. Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, showing sympathy with the President's antagonists in Congress, was suspended from office in contravention of the Tenure of Office law, after he had refused to resign upon the President's request. This brought about the impeachment of Mr. Johnson as President. He had previously vetoed the bill as unconstitutional, and it passed over his veto.

His enemies had tried to find grounds for his impeachment as early as December, 1866, partly on account of his personal habits it being alleged that he drank to excess—a fault to which General Carl Schurz alludes in his 'Reminiscences,' as a fact he learned when he was stationed in Nashville, during Johnson's term as military governor. But sufficient grounds were not found to justify presentment of articles. He removed Stanton from office February 21, 1868. and, on the twenty-fourth, the House resolved to impeach him. Articles of impeachment, eleven in number, were prepared, and presented to the Senate. The stress of the prosecution was on the eleventh article, which charged the illegal removal of Mr. Stanton. The trial lasted till the sixteenth of May, when the test vote was taken on the eleventh article. Thirty-five senators voted for conviction and nineteen for acquittal. Two thirds being required to convict, he was declared not quilty as to that article. Votes were taken on other articles with a like result, and the President was discharged and resumed the duties of his office. A change of one vote would have resulted in conviction. All the Democrats voted for acquittal, as did a number of Republicans, on the grounds that the laws he was charged with violating were of doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. Johnson's aggressive spirit was unbroken by the impeachment, and he continued to veto bills which did not command his approval to the end of his term. He had made a vigorous speech in favor of the veto power, when he was a member of the Senate, and he exercised that power, while he was President, more frequently than any five of his predecessors had done.

Returning to Tennessee upon the expiration of his term, March 4, 1869, he lived there the rest of his life. Having been in public life since his early manhood, he could not be content to be a private citizen. Soon after his return he was a candidate before the Legislature for a seat in the United States Senate, but was defeated. In 1872 he was defeated as a candidate for congressman-at-large. In January, 1875, he was elected United States Senator, as a Democrat, and took his seat at an extra session held that spring. His only speech of note during the session was a bitter attack on General Grant, who had not been subservient to him during his contest with Congress; but it was couched in such terms as to avoid the charge of a breach of privilege. On July 29, 1875, he was stricken with paralysis, when on a visit to his daughter, near Elizabethtown in east Tennessee, and died the next day.

That Andrew Johnson was a patriot as well as a demagogue, on a large scale, must appear from the foregoing. His services to the country for the preservation of the Union, at the critical period of the contest were invaluable. That his talents were great and versatile is evident from his wonderful success over such great obstacles, and during such a chaotic period. Whether Lincoln, had he lived, could have carried out his plans of reconstruction, which his successor adopted, against the influence of Stevens, Sumner, and others, can only be conjectured. Johnson made a strenuous fight for it, and almost sacrificed himself as the result. For it, he is entitled to the lasting gratitude of the people of the South, and it is a satisfaction for us to know that, though his and our cause was defeated then, the country is generally now of the opinion that his was the wiser policy. His public papers and orders from April, 1865, to March, 1869, as found in the Congressional Records and in the archives of the several departments in Washington, are a lasting monument to his unflagging industry, his dauntless courage, and his signal ability.

SPEECH ON THE HOMESTEAD BILL

Delivered in the United States Senate May 29, 1858.

I know there are many, and even some in the Democratic ranks, whose nerves are a little timid in regard to trusting the people with too much power. Sir, the people are the safest, the best, and the most reliable lodgment of power, if you have a population of this kind. Keep up the middle class; lop off an aristocracy on the one hand, and a rabble on the other; let the middle class maintain the ascendency, let them have the power, and your Government is always secure. Then you need not fear the people. I know, as I have just remarked, that some are timid in regard to trusting the people; but there can be no danger from a people who are interested in their Government, who have homes to defend, and wives and children to care for. Even if we test this proposition by that idea of self-interest which is said to govern and control man, I ask you if a man, who has an interest in his country, is not more reliable than one who has none? Is not a man who is adding to the wealth of his country more reliable than one who is simply a consumer and has no interest in it? If we suppose a man to be governed only by the principle of selfinterest, is he not more reliable when he has a stake in the country, and is it not his interest to promote and advance his own condition? Is it not the interest of the great mass to have everything done rightly in reference to Government? The great mass of the people hold no office; they expect nothing from the Government. The only way they feel, and know, and understand the operations of the Government is in the exactions it makes from them. When they are receiving from the Government protection in common, it is their interest to do right in all governmental affairs; and that being their interest, they are to be relied upon, even if you suppose men to be actuated altogether by the principle of self-interest. It is the interest of the middle class to do right in all governmental affairs; and hence they are to be relied upon. Instead of requiring you to keep up your armies, your mounted men, and your footmen on the frontier, if you will let the people go and possess this public land on the conditions proposed in this bill, you will have an army on the frontier composed of men who will defend their own firesides, who will take care of their own homes, and will defend the other portions of the country, if need be, in time of war.

I would remark in this connection, that the public lands have paid for themselves. According to the report of Mr. Stuart of Virginia, the Secretary of the Interior in 1850, it was shown that then the public lands had paid for themselves, and sixty millions over. We have received into the Treasury since that time about thirty-two million dollars from the public lands. They have, therefore, already paid the Government more than they cost, and there can be no objection to this bill on the ground that the public lands have been bought with the common treasure of the whole country. Besides, this bill provides that each individual making an entry shall pay all the expenses attending it.

We see, then, Mr. President, the effect this policy is to have on population. Let me ask here—looking to our popular elections, looking to the proper lodgment of power—is it not time that we had adopted a policy which would give us men interested in the affairs of the country to control and sway our elections? It seems to me that this cannot long be debated; the point is too clear. The agricultural and mechanical portion of the community are to be relied upon for the preservation and continuance of this Government. The great mass of the people, the great middle class, are honest. They toil for their support, accepting no favor from Government. They live by labor. They do not live by consumption, but by production; and we should consume as small a portion of their production as it is possible for us to consume, leaving the producer to appropriate to his own use and benefit as much of the product of his own labor as it is possible in the nature of things to do. The great mass of the people need advocates —men who are honest and capable, who are willing to defend them. How much legislation is done for classes, and how little care seems to be exercised for the great mass of the people! When we are among our constituents, it is very easy to make appeals to the people and professions of patriotism. and then-I do not mean to be personal or invidious-it is very easy, when we are removed from them a short distance, to forget the people and legislate for classes, neglecting the interest of the great mass. The mechanics and agriculturists are honest, industrious, and economical. Let it not be supposed that I am against learning or education, but I might speak of the man in the rural districts in the language of Pope:

Unlearned, he knew no schoolman's subtle art, No language but the language of the heart; By nature honest, by experience wise; Healthy by temperance and exercise.

This is the kind of men whom we must rely upon. Let your public lands be settled; let them be filled up; let honest men become cultivators and tillers of the soil. I do not claim to be prophetic, but I have sometimes thought that if we would properly direct our legislation in reference to our public lands and our other public policy, the time would come when this would be the greatest government on the face of the earth. Go to the great valley of the Mississippi; take the western slope of the mountains to the Pacific Ocean; take the whole area of this country, and we find that we have over three million square miles. Throw off one fourth as unfit for cultivation, reducing the area of the United States to fifteen hundred million acres, and by appropriating three acres to a person, it will sustain a population of over five hundred million people; and I have no doubt, if this continent was strained to its utmost capacity, it could sustain the entire population of the world. Let us go on and carry out our destiny; interest men in the soil; let your vacant land be divided equally so that men can have homes; let them live by their own industry; and the time will come when this will be the greatest nation on the face of the earth. Let agriculture and the mechanic arts maintain the ascendency, and other professions and pursuits be subordinate to them, for on these two all others rest.

* * * * * *

I live in a Southern State; and, if I know myself, I am as good a Southern man as any one who lives within the borders of the South. It seems to be feared that by this bill we compel men to go on the lands. I want to compel no man to go. I want to leave each and every man to be controlled by his own inclination, by his own interest, and not to force him; but is it statesmanlike, is it philanthropic, is it Christian, to keep a man in a State, and refuse to let him go, because, if he does go, he will help to populate some other portion of the country? If a man lives in the county in which I live, and he can, by crossing the line into another county, better his condition, I say let him go. If, by crossing the boundary of my State and going into another, he can better his condition, I say let him go. If a man can go from Tennessee into Illinois, or Louisiana, or Mississippi, or Arkansas, or any other State, and better his condition, let him go. I care not where he goes, so that he locates himself in this great area of freedom, becomes attached to our institutions, and interested in the prosperity and welfare of the country. I care not where he goes, so that he is under the protection of our Stars and Stripes. I say, let him go where he can better the condition of himself, his wife, and children; let him go where he can receive the greatest remuneration for his toil and for his labor. What kind of a policy is it to say that a man shall be locked up where he was born, and shall be confined to the place of his birth?

Take the State of North Carolina, represented by the honorable Senator before me-and I have no doubt it is his intention to represent that people to their satisfaction—would it have been proper to require the people of North Carolina, from her early settlement to the present time, to be confined within her boundaries? Would they not have looked upon it as a hard sentence? Would they not have looked upon it as oppressive and cruel? North Carolina has supplied the Western States with a large proportion of her population, for the reason that by going West they could better their condition. Who would prevent them from doing it? Who would say to the poor man in North Carolina, that has no land of his own to cultivate, that lives upon some barren angle, or some piny plain, or in some other State upon some stony ridge, that he must plough and dig the land appointed to him by his landlord, and that he is not to emigrate to any place where he can better his condition? What is his prospect? He has to live poor; he has to live hard; and, in the end, when he dies poverty, want, is the only inheritance he can leave his children. There is no one who has a higher appreciation of North Carolina than I have; she is my native State. I found it to be my interest to emigrate, and I should have thought it cruel and hard if I had been told that I could not leave her boundary. Although North Carolina did not afford me the advantages of education, though I cannot speak in the language of the schoolmen, and call her my cherishing mother, yet, in the language of Cowper, "with all her faults, I love her still." She is still my mother; she is my native State; and I love her as such, and I love her people, too. But what an idea is it to present, as influencing the action of a statesman, that people may not emigrate from one State to another! Sir, I say let a man go anywhere within the boundaries of the United States where he can better his condition.

* * * * * *

Sir, carry out the Homestead policy, attach the people to the soil, induce them to love the Government, and you will have the North reconciled to the South, and the South to the North, and we shall not have invidious doctrines preached to stir up bad feelings in either section. I know that in my own State, and in the other Southern States, the men who do not own slaves are among the first to take care of the institution. They will submit to no encroachment from abroad, no interference from other sections.

I have said, Mr. President, much more than I intended to say, and, I fear, in rather a desultory manner, but I hope I have made myself understood. I heard that some gentleman was going to offer an amendment to this bill, providing that the Government should furnish every man with a slave. So far as I am concerned, if it suited him, and his inclination led him that way, I wish to God every head of a family in the United States had one to take the drudgery and menial service off his family. I would have no objection to that; but this intimation was intended as a slur upon my proposition. I want that to be determined by the people of the respective States, and not by the Congress of the United States. I do not want this body to interfere by innuendo or by amendment, prescribing that the people shall have this or the other. I desire to leave that to be determined by the people of the respective States, and not by the Congress of the United States.

I hope, Mr. President, that this bill will be passed. I think it involves the very first principles of the Government: it is founded upon statesmanship, humanity, philanthropy, and even upon Christianity itself. I know the argument has been made, why permit one portion of the people to go and take some of this land and not another? The law is in general terms; it places it in the power of every man who will go to take a portion of the land. The Senator from Alabama suggests to me that a person, in order to get the benefit of this bill, must prove that he is not the owner of other land. An amendment was vesterday inserted in the bill striking out that provision. Then it places all on an equality to go and take. Why should this not be done? It was conceded yesterday that the land was owned by the people. There are over three million heads of families in the United States; and if every man who is the head of a family were to take a quarter section of public land, there would still be nearly four million quarter-sections left. If some people go and take quarter-sections it does not interfere with the rights of others, for he who goes takes only a part of that which is his, and takes nothing that belongs to anybody else. The domain belongs to the whole people; the equity is in the great mass of the people; the Government holds the fee and passes the title, but the beneficial interest is in the people. There are, as I have said, two quarter-sections of land for every head of a family in the United States, and we merely propose to permit a head of a family to take one half of that which belongs to him.

I believe the passage of this bill will strengthen the bonds of the Union. It will give us a better voting population, and just in proportion as men become interested in property, they will become reconciled to all the institutions of property in the country, in whatever shape they may exist. Take the institution of slavery, for instance: would you rather trust it to the mercies of a people liable to be ruled by the mobs of which my honorable friend from South Carolina spoke, or would you prefer an honest set of landholders? Which would be the most reliable? Which would guarantee the greatest security to our institutions, when they come to the test of the ballot-box?

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pass this bill. I think it will be the beginning of a new state of things—a new era.

So far as I am concerned—I say it not in any spirit of boasting or egotism—if this bill were passed, and the system it inaugurates carried out, of granting a reasonable quantity of land for a man's family, and looking far into the future I could see resulting from it—a stable, an industrious, a hardy, a Christian, a philanthropic community, I should feel that the great object of my little mission was fulfilled. All that I desire is the honor and the credit of being one of the American Congress to consummate and carry out this great scheme that is to elevate our race and to make our institutions more permanent. I want no reputation, as some have insinuated. You may talk about Jacobism, Red Republicanism, and so on. I pass by such insinuations as the idle wind which I regard not.

I know the motives that prompt me to action. I can go back to that period in my own history when I could not say that I had a home. This being so, when I cast my eyes from one extreme of the United States to the other, and behold the great number that are homeless, I feel for them. I believe this bill would put them in possession of homes; and I want to see them realizing that sweet conception when each man can proclaim, "I have a home; an abiding place for my wife and for my children; I am not the tenant of another; I am my own ruler; I will move according to my own will, and not at the dictation of another."

Yes, Mr. President, if I should never be heard of again on the surface of God's habitable globe, the proud satisfaction of having contributed my little aid to the consummation of this great measure is all the reward I desire.

The people need friends. They have a great deal to bear. They make all; they do all; but how little they participate in the legislation of the country! All, or nearly all, of our legislation is for corporations; for monopolies, for classes, and individuals; but the great mass who produce while we consume, are little cared for; their rights and interests are neglected and overlooked. Let us, as patriots, as statesmen, let us as Christians, consummate this great measure which will exert an influence throughout the civilized world in fulfilling our destiny. I thank the Senate for their attention.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Delivered April 15, 1865.

GENTLEMEN:—I must be permitted to say that I have been almost overwhelmed by the announcement of the sad event which has so recently occurred. I feel incompetent to perform duties so important and responsible as those which have been so unexpectedly thrown upon me. As to an indication of any policy which may be pursued by me in the administration of the Government, I have to say that that must be left for development as the Administration progresses. The message or declaration must be made by the acts as they transpire. The only assurance that I can now give of the future is reference to the past. The course which I have taken in the past in connection with this rebellion must be regarded as a guaranty of the future. My past public life, which has been long and laborious, has been founded, as I in good conscience believe, upon a great principle of right, which lies at the basis of all things. The best energies of my life have been spent in endeavoring to establish and perpetuate the principles of free government, and I believe that the Government in passing through its present perils will settle down upon principles consonant with popular rights more permanent and enduring than heretofore. I must be permitted to say, if I understand the feelings of my own heart, that I have long labored to ameliorate and elevate the condition of the great mass of the American people. Toil and an honest advocacy of the great principles of free government have been my lot. Duties have been mine; consequences are God's. This has been the foundation of my political creed, and I feel that in the end the Government will triumph and that these great principles will be permanently established.

In conclusion, gentlemen, let me say that I want your encouragement and countenance. I shall ask and rely upon you and others in carrying the Government through its present perils. I feel in making this request that it will be heartily responded to by you and all other patriots and lovers of the rights and interests of a free people.

FIRST ANNUAL MESSAGE

Washington, December 4, 1865.

FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REP-RESENTATIVES:—To express gratitude to God in the name of the people for the preservation of the United States is my first duty in addressing you. Our thoughts next revert to the death of the late President by an act of parricidal treason. The grief of the nation is still fresh. It finds some solace in the consideration that he lived to enjoy the highest proof of his confidence by entering on the renewed term of the Chief Magistracy to which he had been elected; that he brought the Civil War substantially to a close; that his loss was deplored in all parts of the Union, and that foreign nations have rendered justice to his memory. His removal cast upon me a heavier weight of cares than ever devolved upon any one of his predecessors. To fulfill my trust I need the support and confidence of all who are associated with me in the various departments of Government and the support and confidence of the people. There is but one way in which I can hope to gain their necessary aid. It is to state with frankness the principles which guide my conduct, and their application to the present state of affairs, well aware that the efficiency of my labors will in a great measure depend upon your and their undivided approbation.

The Union of the United States of America was intended by its authors to last as long as the states themselves shall last. "The Union shall be perpetual" are the words of the Confederation. "To form a more perfect Union," by an ordinance of the people of the United States, is the declared purpose of the Constitution. The hand of Divine Providence was never more plainly visible in the affairs of men than in the framing and the adopting of that instrument. It is beyond comparison the greatest event in American history, and, indeed, is it not of all events in modern times the most pregnant with consequences for every people of the earth? The members of the Convention which prepared it brought to their work the experience of the Confederation, of their several States, and of other republican governments, old and new; but they needed and they obtained a wisdom superior to experience. And when for its validity it required the approval of a people that occupied a large part of a continent and acted separately in many distinct conventions, what is more wonderful than that, after earnest contention and long discussion, all feelings and all opinions were ultimately drawn in one way to its support? The Constitution to which life was thus imparted contains within itself ample resources for its own preservation. It has power to enforce the laws, punish treason, and insure domestic tranquillity. In case of the usurpation of the government of a State by one man or an oligarchy, it becomes a duty of the United States to make good the guaranty to that State of a republican form of government, and so to maintain the homogeneousness of all. Does the lapse of time reveal defects? A simple mode of amendment is provided in the Constitution itself, so that its conditions can always be made to conform to the requirements of advancing civilization. No room is allowed even for the thought of a possibility of its coming to an end. And these powers of self-preservation have always been asserted in their complete integrity by every patriotic Chief Magistrate—by Jefferson and Jackson not less than by Washington and Madison. The parting advice of the Father of his Country, while yet President, to the people of the United States was that the free Constitution, which was the work of their hands, might be sacredly maintained; and the inaugural words of President Jefferson held up "the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad." The Constitution is the work of "the people of the United States," and it should be as indestructible as the people.

It is not strange that the framers of the Constitution, which had no model in the past, should not have fully comprehended the excellence of their own work. Fresh from a struggle against arbitrary power, many patriots suffered from harassing fears of an absorption of the State governments by the General Government, and many from a dread that the States would break away from their orbits. But the very greatness of our country should allay the apprehension of encroachments by the General Government. The subjects that come unquestionably within its jurisdiction are so numerous that it must ever naturally refuse to be embarrassed by questions that lie beyond it. Were it otherwise the Executive would sink beneath the burden, the channels of justice would be choked, legislation would be obstructed by excess, so that there is a greater temptation to exercise some of the functions of the General Government through the States than to trespass on their rightful sphere. The "absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority" was at the beginning of the century enforced by Jefferson as "the vital principle of republics;" and the events of the last four years have established, we will hope forever, that there lies no appeal to force.

The maintenance of the Union brings with it "the support of the State governments in all their rights," but it is not one of the rights of any State government to renounce its own place in the Union or to nullify the laws of the Union. The largest liberty is to be maintained in the discussion of the acts of the Federal Government, but there is no appeal from its laws except to the various branches of that Government itself, or to the people, who grant to the members of the legislative and of the executive departments no tenure but a limited one, and in that manner always retain the powers of redress.

"The sovereignty of the States" is the language of the Confederacy, and not the language of the Constitution. The latter contains the emphatic words—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Certainly the Government of the United States is a limited government, and so is every State government a limited government. With us this idea of limitation spreads through every form of administration—general, State, and municipal—and rests on the great distinguishing principle of the recognition of the rights of man. The ancient republics absorbed the individual in the state—prescribed his religion and controlled his activity. The American system rests on the assertion of the equal right of every man to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, to freedom of conscience, to the culture and exercise of all of his faculties. As a consequence the State government is limited—as to the General Government in the interest of union, as to the individual citizen in the interest of freedom.

States, with proper limitations of power, are essential to the existence of the Constitution of the United States. At the very commencement, when we assumed a place among the powers of the earth, the Declaration of Independence was adopted by States; so also were the Articles of Confederation; and when "the people of the United States" ordained and established the Constitution it was the assent of the States. one by one, which gave it vitality. In the event, too, of any amendment to the Constitution, the proposition of Congress needs the confirmation of States. Without States one great branch of the legislative government would be wanting. And if we look beyond the letter of the Constitution to the character of our country, its capacity for comprehending within its jurisdiction a vast continental empire is due to the system of States. The best security of the perpetual existence of the States is the "supreme authority" of the Constitution of the United States. The perpetuity of the Constitution brings with it the perpetuity of the States; their mutual relation makes us what we are, and in our political system their connection is indissoluble. The whole cannot exist without the parts, nor the parts without the whole. So long as the Constitution of the United States endures, the States will endure. The destruction of the one is the destruction of the other; the preservation of the one is the preservation of the other.

I have thus explained my views of the mutual relations of the Constitution and the States, because they unfold the principles on which I have sought to solve the momentous questions and overcome the appalling difficulties that met me at the very commencement of my Administration. It has been my steadfast object to escape from the sway of momentary passions and to derive a healing policy from the fundamental and unchanging principles of the Constitution.

I found the States suffering from the effects of a civil war. Resistance to the General Government appeared to have exhausted itself. The United States had recovered possession of their forts and arsenals, and their armies were in the occupation of every State which had attempted to secede. Whether the territory within the limits of those States should be held as conquered territory, under military authority emanating from the President as the head of the Army, was the first question that presented itself for decision.

Now military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of discontent, would have divided the people into the vanguishers and the vanguished, and would have envenomed hatred rather than have restored affection. Once established. no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration to and from that portion of the country is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony, and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home, would place himself willingly under military rule? The chief persons who would have followed in the train of the Army would have been dependents on the General Government or men who expected profit from the miseries of their erring fellow-citizens. The powers of patronage and rule which would have been exercised, under the President, over a vast and populous and naturally wealthy region are greater than, unless under extreme necessity, I should be willing to entrust to any one man. They are such as, for myself, I could never, unless on occasions of great emergency, consent to exercise. The willful use of such powers, if continued through a period of years, would have endangered the purity of the general administration and the liberties of the States which had remained loval.

Besides, the policy of military rule over a conquered territory would have implied that the States whose inhabitants may have taken part in the rebellion had by the act of those inhabitants ceased to exist. But the true theory is that all pretended acts of secession were from the beginning null and void. The States cannot commit treason nor screen the individual citizens who may have committed treason any more than they can make valid treaties or engage in lawful commerce with any foreign power. The States attempting to secede placed themselves in a condition where their vitality was impaired, but not extinguished; their functions suspended, but not destroyed.

But if any State neglects or refuses to perform its offices there is the more need that the General Government should maintain all its authority and as soon as practicable resume the exercise of all its functions. On this principle I have acted, and have gradually and quietly, and by almost imperceptible steps, sought to restore the rightful energy of the General Government and of the States. To that end provisional governors have been appointed for the States, conventions called, legislatures assembled, and Senators and Representatives chosen to the Congress of the United States. At the same time the courts of the United States, as far as could be done, have been reopened, so that the laws of the United States may be enforced through their agency.

[After reciting the steps he had taken in the different departments to accommodate the States rehabilitated, and the provisions he had made for their participation in amendment of the Constitution, he discusses the relation of the General Government towards the four million "inhabitants whom the war has called into freedom."—Ed.]

On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors, by the proclamation of the Executive, I took for my counsel the Constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise. During the period of the Confederacy there continued to exist a very great diversity in the qualifications of electors in the several States, and even within a State a distinction of qualifications prevailed with regard to the officers who were to be chosen.

* * * * * *

After the formation of the Constitution it remained, as before, the uniform usage for each State to enlarge the body of its electors according to its own judgment, and under this system one State after another has proceeded to increase the number of its electors, until now universal suffrage, or something very near it, is the general rule.

* * * * * *

[He then proceeds to argue that the matter of suffrage should be left to the several States. And after referring to the reports of the several departments and enlarging upon the condition of the finances and of the war department especially, he ends the message as follows.—Ed.]:

Where in past history does a parallel exist to the public happiness which is within the reach of the people of the United States? Where in any part of the globe can institutions be found so suited to their habits or so entitled to their love as their own free Constitution? Every one of them, then, in whatever part of the land he has his home, must wish its perpetuity. Who of them will not now acknowledge, in the words of Washington, that "every step by which the people of the United States have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency"? Who will not join with me in the prayer that the Invisible Hand which has led us through the clouds that gloomed around our path will so guide us onward to a perfect restoration of fraternal affection that we, of this day, may be able to transmit our great inheritance of State governments in all their rights, of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, to our posterity, and they to theirs through countless generations?

Andrew Johnson.

JOSIAH STODDARD JOHNSTON

[1833—]

REUBEN T. DURRETT

C OLONEL JOSIAH STODDARD JOHNSTON, son of John Harris and Eliza Ellen (Davidson) Johnston, was born in New Orleans, February 10, 1833. Colonel Johnston's father, who was an elder brother of General Albert Sidney Johnston, went to Louisiana when a young man with his elder half-brother, Honorable Josiah Stoddard Johnston, a prominent lawyer of that State who was United States Senator 1822-'33, and who was killed by a steamboat explosion in 1833, just after having been elected a third time. John Harris Johnston became a successful lawyer and planter in the Parish of Rapides, was Speaker of the Louisiana House of Representatives in 1830, and at the time of his death was parish judge. an office corresponding to a circuit judgeship in Kentucky. His wife had preceded him in death a year, and the subject of this sketch was thus doubly orphaned when he was but five years old. Shortly after his father's death he was brought to Kentucky, and with his two brothers, one elder and the other younger, was reared by Colonel George Hancock of Jefferson County, and his wife, the latter being his maternal aunt. His early education was had at the Latin school of S. V. Womack, Shelbyville, and at Georgetown, Kentucky, at the Western Military Institute, in which James G. Blaine was at that time professor. In 1850 he entered the sophomore class at Yale and was graduated there in 1853. He then attended the Law School of the University of Louisville and received his diploma in 1854. In the same year he married Eliza, daughter of George W. Johnson of Scott County, Kentucky, afterward Provisional Governor of Kentucky, who fell fighting as a private at Shiloh, although bearing the rank of brigadier. From 1855 to 1859 he planted cotton in Arkansas, and in the latter year sold his plantation and became a farmer in Scott County, Kentucky. He was thus engaged when the war broke out. In 1861 he declined a nomination for the Legislature, and cast his fortunes with the South. His service was first upon the staff of General Bragg, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel until 1863; upon the staff of General S. B. Buckner until after the battle of Chickamauga; from that time he was Chief of Staff to General John C. Breckinridge until the latter became Secretary of War in March, 1865. The last two months of the war he was on the staff of General John Echols, who succeeded General Breckinridge. Besides other engagements, Colonel Johnston was in the battles of Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, New Market, Cold Harbor, and Winchester, receiving special mention for gallantry in the reports of his chiefs.

After the war, having to start life afresh, he practiced law successfully in Helena, Arkansas, but preferring Kentucky, he settled in Frankfort in the autumn of 1867 as editor of The Yeoman, in which capacity he served until 1886, when its publication ceased. In 1869 he assisted in organizing the Kentucky Press Association, and from 1870 to 1886 was its president by annual election. During a large part of the time of his residence in Frankfort he was secretary or chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee; Adjutantgeneral of Kentucky, 1871, and Secretary of State from 1875 to 1879. In 1875 he was a candidate for Governor, before the Democratic State Convention, and failed to receive the nomination, but, holding the balance of power, named the candidate. In 1889 he removed from Frankfort to Louisville, where he now resides. He has three children living, George W. Johnston, his oldest, J. Stoddard Johnston, Jr., of New York City, and Harris H. Johnston, his fourth child, of St. Louis. His second child, Mary, wife of W. B. Wisdom of New Orleans, died in that city in 1904, and his third, Eliza W. Johnston, died in Frankfort in 1888. Mrs. Johnston, his wife, died in Louisville, Kentucky, November 26, 1901.

In personality there are few men more striking than Colonel Johnston. Always a courtly and dignified gentleman, he never fails to attract attention in any assembly. Strangers are strongly impressed by his fine bearing, his apparent high intellectuality, and his manifest right of leadership. Such impressions are never changed by long acquaintanceship. His lifetime friends have found him always the same. His character is real in all its features, and his strong convictions, firm principles, and native dignity are in no measure underestimated by the genial, open-hearted, and frank intercourse of close association. He is at home anywhere, alike in the drawing-room, the camp, or the council, and whenever he appears his high character meets with true appreciation.

Throughout Kentucky, Colonel Johnston is as thoroughly well known as any other citizen of the State. He has a wide circle of friends, and his contact with public men has given him rare advantage of acquaintance. As a political economist, his opinion carries weight with all of the higher classes and better minds, and his ability as an administrative officer is everywhere recognized. He writes with wonderful ease and accuracy, and in the preparation of state papers, or of any expressions involving matters of public interest, there is no more forcible authority in the State. His long experience as a constitutional lawyer, an editor and state officer, has given him familiarity with almost every feature of social or political organization. Added to this, an incorruptible integrity of opinion, an unshrinking moral courage, and a natural pride of ancestry, have so accentuated his character that his name is the synonym of honor as well as of ability. To his rapid and accurate observation and his inherent military genius are due many of the ablest papers and plans of the distinguished commanders under whom he served during the late war. His powers of perception are quick and correct, and his exceptional grace of education has given him a readiness of expression that few public men possess.

Outside of classical and general literary attainments, he has acquired a knowledge of the geology and botany of almost every section of the country. He has made a close and careful study of natural science in nearly all its forms, not from ambition to excel in any particular branch, but from pure love of that kind of learning. It may be said that his familiarity with both the flora and fauna of Kentucky has come more of incidental observation, based upon a scholastic acquirement of general principles of nature, than from any systematic devotion of time to particular study. It is only from such gentle and generous characters as this that have come the greater measures of information that go to make up the world's knowledge of the component parts of the earth upon which we live. He has studied the character and habits of every flower, shrub, and tree of Kentucky, and shows thoroughly the progenitors of many of the beautiful plants that adorn our gardens and conservatories. His power of differentiation is finely developed, and his analysis invariably correct. In geological science, his knowledge has been of incalculable benefit to the opening of the physical resources of the State, and he has given the results of his observations freely to the public from a pure love of his subjects rather than from any hope of personal reward. The writer of this brief biographical sketch has known him from boyhood, and can justly say he has never known a more magnanimous character. In every feature he is symmetrically and nobly organized.

Not the least important of his many accomplishments was the building of a city in the desert. The existence of Abilene, Texas, now a place of more than five thousand inhabitants, is due entirely to his agency. At the time of building the Texas Pacific Railroad, he selected the site and caused the location to be made. There were then no settlements in its vicinity and nothing to invite the building of a city to the ordinary observer; but he saw its superior advantages in topography, understood its geology, and recognized the agricultural capacity of its surrounding territory. The principal feature that induced him to select it as the proper place for the establishment of a city was its fine stream of living water. Another point within a few miles had been chosen by others, but he properly rejected the idea and bent his energies to the adoption of the site. Obtaining the concurrence of the railroad authorities, and arranging rapidly for the transportation of material, he very soon had his tents supplanted by good frame buildings, and within a few weeks opened a successful sale of lots. People began to flock there from every direction, and in less than one year its population had grown to more than a thousand. Good buildings were rapidly erected of brick and stone, and it began at once to assume commercial importance. Its limits were widely extended and the city arose as if by magic.

In this, as in all other enterprises of his life, he worked more for the common welfare than for his own personal aggrandizement, and, while he derived a fair share of pecuniary benefit from it, he succeeded better in making others rich than in lining his own pockets. The people of Abilene have a sincere regard for him as the founder of their city and the father of its chief enterprises.

In the last thirty years there has been no question of general interest involving the social or political autonomy of the State upon which some appeal has not been made to his knowledge or his judgment, and he has never hesitated to respond. Without the slightest inclination to render himself conspicuous by disseminating his views, but with proper modesty and an obliviousness to his own personality, he has ever been ready to do what he could in behalf of the people. He has always been a collector and conservator of historical facts, allowing nothing that bears any true relation to the State's organization or history to escape his memory or his written data.

His capacity for intellectual work seems boundless. He writes almost without hesitation, hour after hour, and produces page after page of manuscript that rarely needs revision.

In addition to his extensive contributions to the press and to magazines, Colonel Johnston is the author of the following works: 'Memorial History of Louisville,' two volumes royal octavo (1896); 'First Explorations of Kentucky, Explorations of Dr. Thomas Walker' (1750-'51); 'Explorations of Christopher Gist' (1751); 'Filson Club Publication No. 13' (1898); 'Confederate History of Kentucky'; Volume IX of 'Confederate Military History' (Atlanta, 1899).

During the past four or five years, Colonel Johnston has been assistant editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, and is in the enjoyment of vigorous health.

The foregoing biographical sketch was prepared by the late Major Henry T. Stanton, poet-laureate of Kentucky, and inserted in Johnston's 'Memorial History of Louisville' by the publishers without the knowledge or consent of Colonel Johnston. It was such a proper biography, however, that Colonel Johnston could hardly have objected unless his over-modesty did not approve of it in a book of which he was the author. It appears here as it was written by Major Stanton, except for certain corrections and additions which I have made. Colonel Johnston has earned a place in the 'Library of Southern Literature,' for he was born in the South, reared in the South, and has spent his life in the South, with the best years of it spent in fighting its battles in the Civil War. I have known him intimately for almost three-score years and have always admired him, not only for his admirable social qualities, but for his scholarly attainments, his broad culture, and his spotless integrity. He has always had the courage of his convictions with a ready and extraordinary ability to promote the right or resist the wrong.

LIFE AND SERVICES OF GEORGE ROGERS CLARK

Address delivered upon the invitation of The Missouri Historical Society, at the World's Fair, St. Louis, June 24, 1904.

WE have assembled here to-day for the purpose of commemorating the life and services of George Rogers Clark, a pioneer soldier in the history of the West, whose genius and valor made possible the inspiring scenes about us. It is with no purpose of attempting to make merit for myself by an oratorical effort intended to please the ear or gratify the fancy of those before me, but in as plain phrase and as briefly as possible to speak of a hero long neglected by posterity, and to show wherein he merits the distinction here accorded him and the gratitude of all succeeding generations.

By a happy coincidence this day is the anniversary of his departure from the Falls of the Ohio River upon that mission of conquest which resulted in the capture of Kaskaskia and Vincennes. It was on the twenty-fourth of June, 1778, when, with one hundred and fifty men, in the darkness of an almost total eclipse of the sun, he passed the rapids in crude boats propelled by oars, intent upon a campaign conceived by his mind, organized by his own indefatigable energy, and dependent for its success upon his own genius and bravery. Landing at Fort Massiac, twelve miles below the mouth of the Tennessee, on the twenty-eighth, giving his men but one night for rest, on the succeeding day he started for Kaskaskia, one hundred and twenty miles distant. In the afternoon of the fourth of July he arrived in the neighborhood of the town, which he entered after dark, capturing the place with its garrison without firing a shot or the loss of a life. Fortunately, just before starting on this expedition he had, as he says in his memoir, received a letter from Colonel John Campbell, then at Pittsburg, informing him of the treaty of alliance lately made between France and the American colonies. The subsequent use of this information, after his military occupation had become complete, had an important influence in securing the friendship and ultimate allegiance of the residents of Kaskaskia and neighboring settlements, who were almost exclusively French. When assured of his tenure of this post he sent an expedition. under Captain John Bowman, northward, who took possession, without resistance, of the remaining settlements, including Cahokia, also called Cohoes, five miles below St. Louis, now a straggling village of a dozen houses, but then containing one hundred families. St. Louis, which had been settled by Pierre Laclede Leguist, known in history as Laclede, fourteen years before, was the headquarters of the Spanish commandant of upper Louisiana, already drawing to itself the trade which had previously centered in the minor towns. Its population was in full sympathy with Clark's movement.

Shortly after the capture of Cahokia, through the influence of Father Gibault, who had been largely instrumental in securing the cordial accession of the people of Kaskaskia, General Clark received similar fealty from the citizens of Vincennes. and sent Captain Leonard Helm as commandant of that post, improvising a small garrison from a few Americans and Creole volunteer troops and friendly Indians. Being now in possession of all the military posts, and in cordial relations with the white settlers, he turned his attention to making the friendship of the numerous Indian tribes who had before been allies of the English. For that purpose he repaired in person to Cahokia, where for five weeks he held stately councils with the chiefs of all the various tribes. So great was his tact, knowledge of the Indian character, and the combined awe and respect with which he inspired them, that he made treaties of peace with all the principal tribes. In consequence of this wise consummation he did not at any time in his Illinois campaign encounter the hostility of the Indians.

Thus during the summer and autumn of 1778 General Clark was active in strengthening his hold upon the territory of which he had come into possession, in securing the friendship and confidence of both aborigines and settlers, in reorganizing his command, the period for which they had enlisted having expired, and in training the new organization comprising those who had reënlisted and the French recruits.

With the advent of winter, intelligence reached him that Colonel Henry Hamilton, the Lieutenant-Governor at Detroit, had reoccupied Vincennes and had sent a detachment in the direction of Kaskaskia. Then began the remarkable campaign which culminated in the capture of Fort Sackville and Vincennes and confirmed the American title to this vast territory to which there had until then been but a limited and feeble possessory claim. It is not necessary before this audience, or any other of its intelligence in America, to enter into its details; it closed on the twenty-fifth of February, 1779, by a bloodless victory achieved through the most consummate generalship, heroic fortitude, and conspicuous valor.

Hamilton and his officers were sent to Richmond as prisoners to join Rocheblave, commander at Kaskaskia, and thenceforth there was no war in the Illinois country. A civil governor was appointed by Virginia under recommendation of General Clark, and when four years later the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the Colonies was signed, the lakes, instead of the Ohio River, became our northern boundary. When later the tide of emigration began to flow westward and the commercial States of the East were willing to surrender the control of the Mississippi to Spain in exchange for concessions of trade, it was largely by the vigorous protest of Clark and the Kentuckians of that day that the preliminary treaty with that purpose was defeated. Then followed the conditions which led to the treaty of San Lorenzo, October 27, 1795, between the United States and Spain, by which the free navigation of the Mississippi was secured, and later the Louisiana Purchase—a consummation which in the retrospect seems to have resulted naturally as a corollary from Clark's masterly campaign.

It was General Clark's desire after the recapture of Vincennes to make his long-contemplated campaign against Detroit, but inability to secure the proper means led him reluctantly to abandon it. Besides, other fields required his attention, and this was later given to the completion of the defences of Louisville as the chief strategic point in the protection of the Kentucky frontier. To that point he therefore went as chief in command of the colonial forces, and became the founder of that city, as well as of the incipient State. But in the succeeding year, in addition to these services, under direction of Governor Jefferson, he established a fort, named for the latter, on the Mississippi River, looking to the protection of the frontier from both Indian and Spanish aggression. From that service he was called later to Kentucky, and upon its invasion by a large British and Indian force under Colonel Bird, in which great atrocities were committed, he organized an expedition with which he pursued the retreating marauders into the interior of Ohio and inflicted such punishment in the laying waste of their fields and villages that the settlements were not again seriously molested until in 1782, when a similar expedition besieged Bryan's Station, and a few days later defeated the pioneers at Blue Licks with great slaughter. Again he invaded Ohio from the present site of Cincinnati, moving against the Indian towns on the Miami and Scioto, and so thoroughly overwhelmed them that thenceforward there was no organized invasion of Kentucky.

Had George Rogers Clark performed no other service to his country than these they would have entitled him to greater honors than posterity has accorded him. But, grand as they were in their conception and results, they constitute but a few chapters in the volume of his high achievements. A Virginian, he was born in the County of Albemarle, near the home of Tefferson, November 19, 1752. His father, Jonathan Clark, was a farmer, of an English family, early settled in America, and a man of sterling character. Five of his six sons served in the Revolutionary War, and the sixth, too young for that service, was Governor William Clark, the associate of Meriwether Lewis in the exploration to the Pacific. While educational facilities were then far more limited than now, George Rogers Clark received more than an ordinary education, being for a time a pupil of Donald Robertson, a noted Scotch educator. His attention was given specially to mathematics, and he early became a proficient surveyor, his plats and calculations showing skill and exactness. It has been customary with a class of writers to decry his illiteracy, but this is quite as good evidence of their ignorance as his. If there were lapses in his spelling it did not imply lack of mental capacity or vigor. The spelling of many words has been changed within the last century, and there are different rules for punctuation and the use of capitals, so that very few old manuscripts can stand the test of the present day. That great mental capacity and generalship are not to be judged by such criterion was demonstrated by the Duke of Marlborough, who, Macaulay states, was unable to write or spell correctly.

George Rogers Clark had not attained his majority when he came West and engaged in surveying and locating land in the Kanawha country, several years of life in such pursuit and contact with the Indians and pioneers constituting an excellent school for his after career. While thus engaged, hostilities occurred which brought on Lord Dunmore's war and the battle of Point Pleasant in 1774. Though not in the battle he served as captain in Lord Dunmore's column and was offered a commission in the British service, but declined on account of the threatening aspect of relations between the colonies and mother country. In 1775 he came to Kentucky as deputy of Hancock Lee, surveyor, engaged in surveying lands near Frankfort. It was after the settlement of Boonesborough by the Henderson Company of North Carolina, under purchase from the Cherokee Indians by the treaty of Wautauga, of all the land south of the Kentucky River. A previous settlement had been made at Harrodsburg within this boundary, and Clark, going there, identified himself with its interests. The Henderson Company claiming paramount title, he went to Richmond and succeeded in having their title annulled, Virginia reimbursing the company by a grant of two hundred thousand acres at the mouth of Green River, Kentucky. Having thus secured Virginia's recognition of her authority over the territory, as delegate to the Legislature, chosen by the first public convention of the pioneers at Harrodsburg June, 1776, he also succeeded in having an act passed establishing the county of Kentucky, and also in securing substantial aid for its defence, being placed in command of the militia. He thus became the founder of the civil organization of Kentucky in addition to his other services. In the intervals of this busy work, entailing several trips to Richmond, he bore a ready hand in the defence of the settlements against repeated Indian forays.

This, briefly, is an epitome of the remarkable career of this distinguished soldier, not only in extending the boundaries of the public domain to the Mississippi River, but in maintaining the western line of defence in the Revolutionary War. It was his skill and genius for command which organized resistance to the British with their Indian and Canadian allies along the Kentucky front and proved an important factor in that struggle. Had this line been broken by these incursions, as was that in Western Virginia in the early part of the French and Indian War, when the settlers were driven back to the Blue Ridge, Washington's eastern line would have been taken in rear at a critical period of the war. Kentucky would have been relegated to the wilderness state, and the struggle for independence might have had a different termination.

When peace came to the Atlantic States by the treaty which closed the war, it was long only nominal in the West. Indian hostilities, encouraged from the British posts, continued there for more than ten years later, from which the Kentucky pioneers suffered, her soldiers proving also the chief defence for the northwestern frontier until the treaty of peace at Greenville, Ohio, in 1795. This is a feature of the history of the West in its contribution to the struggle for independence and the preservation, as well as extension, of our national boundaries, for which due credit has never been awarded.

The latter part of the life of George Rogers Clark was clouded by the failure of Virginia to settle the accounts created by him in the conquest of the Northwest or to reimburse him for money expended by him. His pride was wounded and his life embittered by poverty and neglect. For a number of years he lived almost a hermit's life in an humble cabin in Indiana overlooking the Falls of the Ohio, in full view of Corn Island, whence he had started on his expedition to Kaskaskia. His relatives, of whom he had a number living near Louisville, used every persuasion to induce him to make his home with them, but he declined. Finally, in 1809, when alone, he fell from his chair with a paralytic stroke, and one of his legs was so severely burned by coming in contact with the log fire by which he was sitting, that after having been taken to the home of his sister, Mrs. Croghan, near Louisville, it was amputated. He remained here, the object of her tender care, his body and mind enfeebled by paralysis, until February 13, 1818, when he died, in his sixty-sixth year.

Thus passed away a heroic character to whom learned critics have accorded military merit of the highest order, and upon whom orators have expended their choicest eulogies. But to those who place a proper estimate upon the great services he performed, and the princely legacy he left his country, there is an irrepressible feeling that adequate justice has not vet been done his name and services in offset for the neglect and injustice inflicted upon him in the years following his active service. In both physical and mental power he combined the elements of a lofty manhood. In stature he was six feet four inches, with a head and features of classic mold, indicative of the genius for command and other high qualities which he illustrated in his career. The painter's art has fortunately preserved a faithful portraiture of his face and form which confirms the highest estimate of his personality deducible from a record of his career. He rose to the zenith of his greatness with the close of his successful campaign in Illinois when not yet twenty-seven. It was the age at which Napoleon became commander of the central army of France, at which Demosthenes, Cicero, and Patrick Henry won their laurels as orators and Clive his first battle in India, through which later he secured that great empire to Great Britain. Like the latter, Clark became a great general by force of his natural powers, rather than by education. Both were alike in their influence over men and the important results achieved with small resources. But Clive secured wealth, titles, and all the emoluments which an appreciative government could lavish upon him, while Clark was treated with indifference, ingratitude, and neglect. Clive enriched himself in millions by tribute exacted from East Indian nabobs for favors conferred. Clark refused a princely gift of land from the Indian Chief. Tobacco, who tendered it with the sole condition that a broad avenue should be opened to his residence, so that the Indians could visit a brave they so much honored, and turned over the gift to Virginia as one he could not accept. Clive lived and died in affluence, while Clark was left in poverty to brood over the injustice with which he was treated. Virginia, when too late, awakened to a sense of her neglect, sent him a sword. which he broke over his crutch, and voted him four hundred dollars a year as a pension for his military service. What a commentary upon the ingratitude alike of the generation which he served so well and those who have profited so largely from the imperial territory he won for them and the boundless legacy of glory he bequeathed to posterity! His grave, though tenderly cared for, is marked only by an humble headstone, while stately mausoleums and gilded statues of imperial elegance adorn our parks and public places commemorative of names and deeds not to be weighed by the same scale with his. Yet they serve a good purpose in making the absence of such proper recognition of the services of George Rogers Clark by his country, which he exalted and enriched, so conspicuous that belated justice will yet be done his memory. The time cannot be distant when some national memorial commensurate with his fame, which is the common heritage of the American people, will attest their admiration and gratitude.

DANIEL BOONE AND THE FIRST SURVEYORS

From "The Settlement of Kentucky," published in The Courier-Journal of Louisville, Kentucky, June 13, 1906.

NEARLY twenty years had elapsed after the passage of Walker and Gist through Kentucky until Daniel Boone, a native of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, but then a pioneer settler on the Yadkin, made his first visit to Kentucky. He had heard of it through John Finlay, a hunter and trader, and in December, 1769, in company with Finlay and four others. William Stewart, Joseph Holden, James Mooney and William Cool, he started for Kentucky. Passing through Cumberland Gap, they made their way to Red River, a northern tributary of the Kentucky, and established a camp on a creek now in Clark County, to which they gave the name of Lulbegrud, by which it is now designated on the map. The name was taken from 'Gulliver's Travels,' a copy of which was in the possession of one of the party, and by the perusal of which they diverted themselves. It is an octavo edition of 1765, in two volumes, illustrated with copperplate engravings, and is now, in good state of preservation, in the library of Colonel R. T. Durrett, of Louisville. From this camp they made hunting and exploring trips. Upon one of these Boone and Stewart were captured by a party of Indians, but after being with them seven days, and allaying suspicion of any such purpose, they made their escape. On returning to camp they found it dismantled and abandoned, and the fate of their late comrades was never known. Not long after this Stewart, while hunting, was killed, and Boone was thus left alone. He then changed his camp to the south side of the Kentucky River, to what was afterward known as Station Camp, and from that as a base made explorations into what is now Madison and adjacent counties. During the spring of 1770 he was unexpectedly joined by his younger brother, Squire Boone, who had come in search of him. The two then hunted and explored together until, their ammunition being nearly exhausted, Squire Boone returned to North Carolina for a fresh supply, and made a successful trip. It was then that Daniel Boone extended his explorations to the Ohio and visited the best portions of the Blue Grass region, the knowledge of which, thus gained, was so valuable a factor in his after career in Kentucky and in the promotion of its settlement. Upon their return to the Yadkin, in March, 1771, the report of their adventures and of the fertile country they found spread through North Carolina and Virginia, and soon proved effective in stimulating immigration. In 1770 Colonel Knox, with forty men, known as "The Long Hunters," visited that part of Kentucky south of the Kentucky River; and in 1771 Simon Kenton explored the country about Maysville, but the parties did not meet.

It was not, however, until 1773, twenty-three years after Dr. Walker's trip, that definite movements were made looking to actual settlements. The schemes of the land companies had been premature. Important adjustments of titles were necessary. The Seven Years' French and Indian War had intervened, the French having disputed the English boundary as claimed by the latter under the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, 1748. and by the terms of the Treaty of Paris, 1763, France had to surrender to England all of her possessions in Canada and her claims east of the Mississippi. The Indians had sided with France, and their bloody incursions had well-nigh driven the Virginia settlers beyond the Blue Ridge. It was not until 1768 that, by the Treaty of Fort Stanwix, near the site of Rome, New York, with the Six Nations, Virginia was able to quiet the title to Kentucky. Meanwhile the mutterings of the coming revolution were becoming louder and resistance to British taxation was openly threatened. But the time was becoming ripe for the great western movement. The speculative feeling which comes in cycles was on again. The quality of the land in the western part of Fincastle County, Virginia, which embraced Kentucky, was becoming known. A surveyor's office was opened, and Virginia was already looking to rewarding with grants of this land the soldiers who had fought in the late war.

In 1773, while there was yet no permanent settlement in Kentucky, three parties, each on its own outlook, met at the mouth of the Kanawha. They were those of Captain Thomas Bullitt, coming to the Falls of the Ohio; Hancock Taylor, the uncle of President Zachary Taylor, as deputy of William Preston, Surveyor of Fincastle County, and the three McAfee brothers, James, George, and Robert, who went up the Kentucky River and surveyed many tracts of land. Captain Bullitt landed at the present site of Louisville at the mouth of Beargrass Creek, which then entered into the Ohio near the foot of Third Street. Here he planted his Jacob staff on the peninsula near the mouth, and ran a line southwardly, practically along the present First Street to Broadway, and thence westwardly, until by a line running north to the Ohio it embraced a tract of two thousand acres, known as the Connelly Survey, included within the boundary of Louisville. Adjoining it to the west he laid off a similar tract known as the Warrendorf Survey, which embraced Fontaine Ferry. He also located various warrants, surveyed other tracts in the vicinity, and made the first plat of Louisville.

In the following year some of them returned, among them Hancock Taylor, who was wounded by the Indians at Drennon's Lick, and died near Richmond while being borne home by his comrades. Colonel John Floyd, one of the most intrepid of the pioneers, a deputy surveyor also, who nine years later met the same fate, and James Douglas, came on to Louisville, located large numbers of warrants, and surveyed many thousand acres, passing eastward to the Blue Grass region similarly engaged. There were also two other parties of hunters and explorers under Captain James Harrod and Isaac Hite. It was then that the town of Harrodsburg was laid off, June 16, 1774. Four or five cabins were built and occupied, and corn was planted. But the freedom from Indian attacks, which admitted of this first house-building since that of Dr. Walker, twenty-four years before, did not last long. For shortly afterward Daniel Boone, who, with Michael Stoner, had been sent by Governor Dunmore to warn surveyors and prospectors of the approaching Indian war, and to leave the territory, communicated the message to all whom he could reach, and Kentucky was vacated, the Harrodsburg houses were abandoned, and the silence of the wilderness once more prevailed. Most of those who left rendezvoused at the mouth of the Kanawha and participated in the battle of Point Pleasant, October 10, 1774, in which the Indians, under Chief Cornstalk, were defeated by the Virginians under Colonel Andrew Lewis. Among those who took part in this campaign were two young men who afterward became conspicuous in Kentucky history, Isaac Shelby and George Rogers Clark, both captains, the first twenty-four and the second twenty-two years old.

MARY JOHNSTON

[1870-]

WILLIAM H. PLEASANTS

THE works of this writer have within a few years attained a wide and deserved popularity, not only in America, but also in England. The sudden rise of a new favorite in the world of letters arouses in the minds of general readers very much the same feelings of wonder and curiosity as are excited in the minds of astronomers when a new star has made its appearance in the heavens. As many of the new stars in the sky are but temporary, shining with dazzling brilliance for a short time, and then gradually fading away into utter darkness, so on the literary horizon appear from time to time writers who suddenly win a large circle of readers, and are as quickly forgotten. The cause, in most instances, both of the sudden rise and equally sudden eclipse of their popularity, is that their works are not based upon intrinsic literary excellence, but upon an appeal to some prejudice, national, social or political, or are enlisted in behalf of some moral or social reform. When the prejudice, which by its nature is transient, has passed away, the raison d'être of such works will cease to exist, and they will deservedly sink into the darkness of oblivion.

Miss Johnston, unheralded and unknown, made her début as a writer in New York and Boston about fifteen years ago. As there are no sectional lines or geographical limits in the great commonwealth of letters, the force of her thinking, the brilliancy of her imagination, and the charm of her style were at once recognized, and the question "Who is Mary Johnston?" was asked in the critical journals. Her first work was received with enthusiasm by a wide circle of readers; her subsequent publications deepened the first favorable impression, and enlarged the circle of her admirers; and if a writer's rank in the world of letters is to be judged by the test of wide popularity alone, she now stands in the first rank of modern writers of fiction. Whether this great popularity will last, time will show; but it is reasonable to anticipate that her novels, written with fine literary skill, devoid of the adventitious aid of sectional or national prejudice, and appealing to those universal principles of human action which men of all nations love and admire, will stand the test of time, and become a permanent and valuable addition to our literature.

Among the various influences which were concerned in the development of this fine genius and in giving it its stamp of worth, the most potent were hereditary talent, the environment of her youthful days, and the peculiar circumstances of her education. regard to the first-named influence, it may be stated that she is sprung from the Johnston stock—a race which has given to our country so many men distinguished for excellence in literature, law, and arms. Her father was Major John W. Johnston, a man of such wide culture and energetic character that he was easily a leader of thought and action to his fellow-citizens, not only in peace, but in the Civil War and in the troublous times which followed. A lawyer by profession, a gallant and distinguished soldier when his country demanded his services, often sent by his fellow-citizens to the State Legislature, often called to positions demanding great executive ability, such as president of the James River and Kanawha Canal Company, president of the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company—in all he showed himself a worthy descendant of the virile stock from which he sprang. Some of his daughter's success is probably due to hereditary talent; but, however that may be, it is certain that the environment of nature, the varied and manifold aspects of the outer world of the beautiful region in which she was born and in which she spent her early years, exerted a more potent influence upon her young and ardent imagination. The habit of close observation of the changing moods and forms of nature then begun, and continued afterward in the other localities where she subsequently resided, is the secret of that wonderful gift of descriptive power by which she is able to make the scenes in which her characters move and act instinct with life and color. Her home was in the far-famed Valley of Virginia, and in the village of Buchanan, situated on the James River, in the midst of the most varied and beautiful scenery of winding river, broad cultivated fields, frowning precipices, rich and verdant valleys and noble mountains. One can hardly conceive of a region better suited to fill an ardent and receptive mind with multitudinous images of beauty in form and color than that in which her early years were spent. When she was about fifteen years old her father removed to Birmingham, Alabama, in which place she resided for some years. Her next place of residence was New York, whither she accompanied her father on his removal from Birmingham and where she made her home until the year 1902, when she removed to Richmond, Virginia, where she now resides. Of late years she has traveled extensively, both in Europe and on this continent. During these travels she has doubtless gathered much that is new and strange in nature and in life, which, let us hope, she will use to enrich and adorn some new work.

The early education of Miss Johnston was entirely different from that to which most young women of this country are subjected. and this fact has been the most potent influence which has worked in developing and forming her character as a writer. During that early period of life in which young minds receive disciplinary training, her health was so delicate that she could not be removed from home to the rougher scene of a boarding-school. Any one of the admirable schools in our land would now be glad to point to Mary Johnston as an example of the training which it gives; but no institution of learning can claim her as its foster-child. Deharred as she was, by ill health from the bodily activities of girls of the same age, her eager mind turned to her father's library, rich in the treasures of English literature. How deeply she drank from the pure "well of English undefiled" can be seen from a perusal of her works. Here was the school in which her mind was trained in vigorous thought and clear expression. She must have devoted much time to the study of the colonial history of Virginia and the contemporary history of England. Not many of the writers who have chosen Virginia and the colonial period as the place and time of their fiction have grasped the very age and body of the times so fully as she has; not one of them has painted the scene of his drama so faithfully. Every reader of her first three novels must have been struck by the accuracy of her descriptions of the scenery of Virginia in all its variety, from the seacoast to the mountains, and by the exquisite skill and truth to nature with which they have been colored.

Miss Johnston has published the following works: 'Prisoners of Hope,' published in England under the title 'The Old Dominion'; 'To Have and to Hold,' published in England under the title 'By Order of the Company'; 'Audrey,' 'Sir Mortimer,' 'The Goddess of Reason, a Drama.'

The prescribed limits of this biographical sketch forbid any extended analysis of these works, yet some brief comment may be useful in aiding a just criticism and fair appreciation of the works of this favorite writer. All these works are historical, not merely in the sense that the author displays an accurate knowledge of names, places and dates, but in the fact that she, in her historical studies, has so fully caught the soul—the spirit—the aspect of the times, that the historical characters she introduces are true to life, and the imaginary ones are such as the conditions and influences of the times would inevitably produce. From the annals of the colony, extending from 1607 to 1774, she has chosen three periods, widely separated in time, as the stages upon which her characters, real and imaginary, are to play their parts. In her first novel, 'Prisoners of Hope,' the time is just after the restoration of the old tyrant, Sir

William Berkeley, to the Governorship in 1660. There never was a period in the history of the colony when the population was so mixed, the hopes and aspirations of the inhabitants so conflicting, as in this. In this mixed population were the rich planters, the poorer middle classes, the negroes, the Indians and the redemptioners. These last were white people, banished from England, for most part for difference in political or religious faith, and sold into slavery for a limited time to the planters. In a society composed of these turbulent elements the scene of the story is laid; and a romantic narrative of conspiracy, attempted insurrection, capture of a fair maiden by Indians and her gallant rescue by her lover, is told with such graphic force and skill that we lay the book down with reluctance.

In her second book the scene is transferred to Jamestown, and the time put back to the administration of Governor Yeardley. At this time the population of the colony was small, and consisted almost entirely of males. The kind London Company, then proprietors of the colony, pitying the forlorn condition of the bachelor inhabitants, sent over a shipload of eighty young women, to be sold for the benefit of the Company and for the solace of the lonely men. In this company of young women was a noble lady, who, to escape the tyranny of King James I, who sought to force her to a marriage which she abhorred, disguised herself in the name and dress of her waiting-woman, and somehow secured admission into the company of eighty female adventurers. At the auction sale of the women, Captain Ralph Percy buys the noble lady for one hundred and twenty pounds of tobacco, and is at once married to her. The rest of the story is mainly confined to the surprising adventures of Captain Ralph on land and sea, and is written in a style equal to the best of the writings of the gifted Robert Louis Stevenson. The upshot of the story is, of course, that the gallant and heroic deeds of the hero win for him the devotion of the noble lady, and love gives him the right "to have and to hold" her for his own.

In 'Audrey' the time is advanced to the administration of Governor Alexander Spotswood, that gallant soldier and fine gentleman who did so much to promote the temporal welfare of the colonists. His far-seeing mind first conceived the hope of an empire to come, beyond the blue line of mountains which was then the actual western boundary of Virginia. His first step to the realization of that hope was the organization of his famous Order of Knights of the Golden Horseshoe, with its classic motto: "Sic juvat transcendere montes."

The story opens with the return of the knights from an exploring expedition beyond the mountains. One of them, Marmaduke Ha-ward, encounters a lonely child near the ruins of a cabin, all the inmates of which, with the exception of this little girl, have been killed or carried off by the Indians. This child is Audrey. She is carried by Haward to Williamsburg, the ancient capital of the colony, where from his ample wealth he causes her to be cared for and educated. On his return from England, after an absence of ten years, he finds the child matured into a beautiful and interesting woman. Around her gathers the play of the master passions of love, jealousy, and revenge, with their natural and usual results.

In 'Sir Mortimer' Miss Johnston passes over the sea and to the times of great Elizabeth. In this work we have one more illustration of the oft-quoted maxim of Horace: "Calum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt—"They change the clime, but not the mind, who pass beyond the sea." We note the same attention to historical accuracy in letter and spirit—the same easy and vigorous style—the same rich imagination which throws its glamor over everything that it touches. We are introduced into company rather better. on the whole, than that which we met in the Virginian novels. In Raleigh and Philip Sidney, in Drake and Nevil and Hawkins, with other captains of that heroic time, we are introduced to some of the best that England has ever produced. Sir Mortimer Ferne, though an imaginary character, is an ideal and true representative of thousands of Englishmen of heroic courage and sublime faith who at that time were ready to imperil life and fortune in defence of their native land and their religious faith, and were, perhaps, too ready to wreak vengeance on the Spaniard for his unspeakable cruelty to their unfortunate countrymen that fell under his power. In Damaric Sedley we have a noble picture of the unswerving devotion of woman to the man to whom she has given her love, even in the eclipse of honor and fame, when Sir Mortimer himself, along with all the world, believes that he has, in the agony of torture, betrayed his countrymen to the Spaniard.

In her drama, 'The Goddess of Reason,' Miss Johnston has changed the scene and the time from the peaceful scenes and comparatively quiet times of the Old Dominion to the storm and stress of the French Revolution. She has not, however, altered her historic method. She has evidently made a prolonged and thoughtful study of that period, and has fully comprehended that awful time. Though her characters are all fictitious, they are typical and representative of the real characters which that tremendous conflict of opposing ideas and passions actually produced. The play of the opposing passions of love, jealousy, plebeian class-hatred and aristocratic pride are skilfully delineated, and the interest of the reader is maintained until the climax is reached in the scene before the Revolutionary Tribunal, followed by the pathetic end of two principal characters of the drama in the waters of the Loire.

In assigning to Miss Johnston a specific place in the world of letters, we did not mean to include her in that rabble of so-called historical novel-writers, whose works, for the most part worthless, have of late inundated the press, but to place her in the highest and best of that class represented by the school of Walter Scott, William M. Thackeray and Charles Kingsley. There is indeed in her novels some general resemblance to some of the works of these great masters, but it is a resemblance easily explained by the influence of teacher upon pupil. A shallow criticism might wrongfully ascribe these resemblances to the base spirit of imitation. But feeble minds imitate, strong minds originate. Miss Johnston's intellectual power is great enough to disdain borrowed strength. Surely the long annals of colonial history have stores of romantic adventure, heroic effort, and splendid courage, ample enough to employ the highest powers of many writers, without any danger of rivalry or imitation; and if 'Sir Mortimer' does bear a strong family likeness to the 'Westward Ho' of Charles Kingsley, surely in the "spacious times of great Elizabeth" there is room enough, not merely for one, but for many illustrations of that heroic spirit which saved England from the fate of unhappy Spain, and made her, what she now is in literature, arts, and arms, the foremost nation in all the world.

It has been a pleasure to record these brief and incomplete notices of the life and literary success of this gifted writer, who has done much to remove the stigma of inferiority which has so long, either justly or unjustly, rested upon the literature of her native land. Let us hope that as she is yet in the prime of her rich imagination and matured powers, the splendid success which she has so far won is but the promise of works of wider compass which will lead to wider and enduring fame.

IN THE WILDERNESS

From 'Prisoners of Hope.' Copyright, Houghton, Mifflin Company, and used here by permission of the publishers and author.

Days passed, and the forest put on a beauty, austere, yet fantastic, bizarre. Above it hung a pale blue sky: within it a perpetual pale blue haze, through which blazed the scarlet and gold of the trees—great bonfires which did not warm, flaming pyres which were never consumed. Morning and evening a shroud of chill, white mist fell upon them, or they would have mocked the sunrise and the sunset. Along the summit of low hills ran a comb of fire—the scarlet of the sumach, leaf and berry; underfoot were crimson vines like trails and splashes of blood; into the streams from which the wanderers stooped to drink, fell the gold of the sycamore. From the hills they looked down on a red and yellow world, a gorgeous burgeoning and blossoming that put the spring to shame, a sea of splendor with here and there a dark-green isle of cedar or of pine. Day after day saw the same calm blue sky, the same blue haze, the same drifting of crimson and gold to earth. The winds did not blow, and the murmur of the forest was hushed. All sound seemed muffled and remote. The deer passed noiseless down the long aisles, the beaver and the otter slipped noiseless into the stream, the bear rolled its shambling bulk away from human neighborhood like a shapeless shadow. At times vast flocks of pigeons darkened the air, but they passed like a cloud. The singing birds were gone. Only at night did sound awake, for then the wolves howled, and the infrequent scream of the panther chilled the blood, and the fires which the wanderers must needs build roared and crackled through the darkness. In the daytime, beauty, vast and melancholy: in the night, shadows and mysteries, the voices of wild beasts and the stillness of the stars; at all times an enemy, they knew not how far away or how near at hand, behind them.

Through this world, which seemed more a phantasm than a reality, Landless and Patricia fared, and were happy. All passion and fear, all mistrust and anger slept in that enchanted calm. They never spoke of the past, they had well-nigh ceased to think of it. When they knelt upon the turf beside some crystal brook, and drank of the water which seemed red wine or molten gold according to the nature of the trees above it, it might have been the water of Lethe.

In the illimitable forest, too, in the monotony of sunshine and shade, of glade and dell, of crystal streams and tiny valleys, each the counterpart of the other, in dense woods and grassy savannas; in the yesterday so like to-day, and the today so like to-morrow, there was no hint of the future. It was enchanted ground, where to-morrow must always be like today. They kept their faces to the east, and they walked each day as many leagues as her strength would permit, and Landless, imitating as best he could the dead Susquehannock, took all precautions to cover their trail; but that done, all was done, and they put their care behind them. Landless, walking in a dream, knew that it was a dream, and said to himself, "I must awaken, but not yet. I will dream and be happy yet a little while." But Patricia dreamt and knew it not. She kept her wonted state, or, rather, with a quiet insistence he kept it for her. He never addressed her save as "Madam," and he cared for her comfort, and in all things bore himself towards her with the formal courtesy he would have shown a queen. He said to himself, "Godfrey Landless, Godfrey Landless, thou mayst forget much, perhaps, for a little while; but not this! If thou dost, thou art no honorable man."

Master of himself he walked beside her, cared for her, tended her, guarded her, served her as if he had been a knighterrant out of a romance, and she a distressed princess. And she rewarded him with a delicate kindliness, and a perfectly trustful, childlike dependence upon his strength, wisdom and resource. All her bearing towards him was marked by an inexpressible charm, half-playful, wholly gracious and womanly. The lady of the manor was gone, and in her place moved the Patricia Verney of the enchanted forest—a very different creature.

Thus they fared through the dying summer, and were happy in the present of soft sunshine, tender haze, fantastic beauty. Sometimes they walked in silence, too truly companions to feel the need of words; at other times they talked, and the hours flew past, for they both had wit, intelligence, quick fancy, high imagination. Sometimes their laughter rang through the glades of the forest, and set the squirrels in the oaks to chattering; sometimes in the melancholy grace of the evening, when the purple twilight sank through the trees, and the large stars came out one by one, they spoke of grave things. of the mysteries of life and death, of the soul and its hereafter. She had early noticed that he never lay down at night without having first silently prayed. There had been a time when she would have laughed at this as Puritan hypocrisy, but now, one dark night, when the noises of the forest were loud about them. and the wind rushed through the trees, she came close to him and knelt beside him. Thenceforward each night, before they lay down beside their fire, and when from out the darkness came all weird and mournful sounds, when the owl hooted. and the catamount screamed, and the long howl of the wolf was answered by its fellow, he stood with bared head, and in a few short, simple words commended them to God. "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for Thou, Lord, only, makest me to dwell in safety."

There came a day when they sat down to rest upon the dark, smooth ground in a belt of pines, and looked between rows of stately columns to where, in the distance, the arcade was closed by a broken and confused glory of crimson oak and yellow maple. Landless told her that it was like gazing at a rose window down the long nave of a cathedral.

"I have never seen a cathedral," she said; "I have dreamed of them, though, of your Milton's 'dim religious light,' and of the rolling music."

"I have seen many," he answered. "But none of them are to me what the Abbey at Westminster is. If you should ever see it—"

Something in her face stopped him; there was a silence, and then he said quietly:

"When you shall see it, is perhaps better, Madam?"

"Yes," she answered, gazing before her with wide fixed eyes.

He did not finish his sentence, and neither spoke again until they had left the pines and were forcing their way through the tall grass and weeds of a wide savanna. They came to a small, clear stream, dotted with wild fowl and mirroring the pale blue sky, and he lifted her in his arms as was his wont and bore her through the shallow water. As he set her gently down upon the other side, she said in a low voice, "I thought you knew. Had it not been for that night, that night which sets us here, you and me—I should be now in London, at Whitehall, at some masque or pageant perhaps. I should be all clad in brocade and jewels, not like this—" She touched her ragged gown as she spoke, then burst into strange laughter. "But God disposes! And you—"

"I should be in a place which is never mentioned at Court, Madam," said Landless grimly. "The grave, to wit. Unless indeed His Excellency proposed hanging me in chains."

She cried out as though she had been struck. "Don't!" she said passionately. "Don't speak to me so! I will not bear it!" and ran past him into the woods beyond the savanna.

When he came up with her he found her lying on a mossy bank with her face hidden.

"Madam," he said, kneeling beside her, "forgive me."

She lifted a colorless face from her hands. "How far are we from the Settlements?" she demanded.

"I do not know, Madam. Some twenty leagues, probably, from the frontier posts."

"How far from the friendly tribes?"

"Something less than that distance."

"Then when we reach them, sir," she said imperiously, "you are to leave me with them at one of the villages above the falls."

"To leave you there?"

"Yes. You will tell them that I am the daughter of one of the paleface chiefs, of one whom the great white chiefs call 'brother,' and they will not dare to harm me or to detain me. They will send me down the river to the nearest post, and the men there will bring me on to Jamestown, and so home."

"And why may not I bring you on to Jamestown—and so home?" demanded Landless with a smile.

"Because—because—you know that you are lost if you return to the Settlements."

"And nevertheless I shall return," he said with another smile.

She struck her hands together. "You will be mad—mad! If you had not been their leader!—but as it is, there is no hope.

Leave me with the friendly Indians, then go yourself to the northward. Make for New Amsterdam. God will carry you through the Indians as He has done so far. I will pray to Him that He do so. Ah, promise me that you will go!"

Landless took her hand and kissed it. "Were you in absolute safety, Madam," he said gently, "and if it were not for one other thing, I would go, because you wish it, and because I would save you any pang, however slight, that you might feel for one who was, and who is, your servant—your slave. I would go from you, and because else it might grieve you, I would strive to keep my life through the forest, through the winter—"

"Ah, the winter!" she cried. "I had forgotten that winter will come."

"But to do that which you propose," he continued, "to leave you to the mercy of fierce and treacherous Indians, but half subdued, friends to the whites only because they must—is out of the question. To leave you at a frontier post among rude trappers and traders, or at some half savage pioneer's, is equally impossible. What tale would you have to tell Colonel Verney? 'The Ricahecrians carried me into the Blue Mountains. There your servant Landless found me and brought me a long distance towards my home. But at the last, to save his own neck, forfeit to the State, he left me, still in the wilderness and in danger, and went his way.' My honor, Madam, is my own, and I choose not so to stain it. Again: I must be the witness to your story. You have wandered for many weeks in a wilderness, far beyond the ken of your friends. your world. Madam. I am a rebel, traitor and convict, a wretch capable of any baseness, of any crime. If I go back with you, throwing myself into the power of Governor and Council, at least I shall be credited with having so borne myself towards my master's daughter as to fear nothing from their hands on that score. The idle and censorious cannot choose but believe you when you say, 'I am come scatheless through weeks of daily and hourly companionship with this man. Rebel and traitor and jail-bird though he be, he never injured me in word, thought, or deed.' . . . For all these reasons, Madam, we must be companions still."

She had covered her face while he was speaking, and she kept it hidden when he had finished. The slowly lengthening shadows of the trees had barred the little glade with black when he spoke again. It was only to ask in his usual voice if she were rested and ready to continue their journey.

She raised her head and looked at him with swimming eyes, then held out her two trembling hands. He took them, helped her to her feet, and before releasing them, bent and touched them with his lips. Then side by side and in silence they traveled on through the halcyon calm of the world around them.

THE DEATHLESS SONG

From 'To Have and To Hold.' Copyright, Houghton, Mifflin Company, and used here by permission of the publishers and author.

She was coming. I watched the slight figure grow out of the dusk between the trees, and the darkness in which I had walked of late fell away. The wood that had been so gloomy was a place of sunlight and song; had red roses sprung up around me I had felt no wonder. She came softly and slowly, with bent head and hanging arms, not knowing that I was near. I went not to meet her—it was my fancy to have her come to me still—but when she raised her eyes and saw me I fell upon my knees.

For a moment she stood still, with her hands at her bosom; then, softly and slowly through the dusky wood, she came to me and touched me upon the shoulder. "Art come to take me home?" she asked. "I have wept and prayed and waited long, but now the spring is here and the woods are growing green."

I took her hands and bowed my head upon them. "I believed thee dead," I said. "I thought that thou hadst gone home, indeed, and I was left in the world alone. I can never tell thee how I love thee."

"I need not telling," she answered. "I am glad that I did so forget my womanhood as to come to Virginia on such an errand; glad that they did laugh at me and insult me in the meadow at Jamestown, for else thou mightst have given me no thought; very heartily glad that thou didst buy me with thy handful of tobacco. With all my heart I love thee, my knight, my lover, my lord and husband—" Her voice broke, and I felt the trembling of her frame. "I love not thy tears upon my hands," she murmured. "I have wandered far and am weary. Wilt rise and put thy arm around me and lead me home?"

I stood up, and she came to my arms like a tired bird to its nest. I bent my head, and kissed her upon the brow, the blue-veined eyelids, the perfect lips. "I love thee," I said. "The song is old, but it is sweet. See! I wear thy color, my lady."

The hand that had touched the ribbon upon my arm stole upward to my lips. "An old song, but a sweet one," she said. "I love thee. I will always love thee. My head may lie upon thy breast, but my heart lies at thy feet."

There was joy in the haunted wood, deep peace, quiet thankfulness, a springtime of the heart—not riotous like the May, but fair and grave and tender like the young world in the sunshine without the pines. Our lips met again and again, and then, with my arm around her, we moved to the giant pine beneath which stood the minister. He turned at our approach, and looked at us with a quiet and tender smile, though the water stood in his eyes. "'Heaviness may endure for a night,'" he said, "'but joy cometh in the morning.' I thank God for you both."

"Last summer, in the green meadow, we knelt before you while you blessed us, Jeremy," I answered. "Bless us now again, true friend and man of God."

He laid his hands upon our bowed heads and blessed us, and then we three moved through the dismal wood and beside the sluggish stream down to the great bright river. Ere we reached it the pines had fallen away, the haunted wood was behind us, our steps were set through a fairy world of greening bough and springing bloom. The blue sky laughed above, the late sunshine barred our path with gold. When we came to the river it lay in silver at our feet, making low music among its reeds.

I had bethought me of the boat which I had fastened that morning to the sycamore between us and the town, and now we moved along the river bank until we should come to the tree. Though we walked through an enemy's country we saw no foe.

Stillness and peace encompassed us; it was like a beautiful dream from which one fears no wakening.

As we went, I told them, speaking low, for we knew not if we were yet in safety, of the slaughter that had been made and of Diccon. My wife shuddered and wept, and the minister drew long breaths while his hands opened and closed. And then, when she asked me, I told of how I had been trapped to the ruined hut that night and of all that had followed. When I had done she turned within my arm and clung to me with her face hidden. I kissed her and comforted her, and presently we came to the sycamore tree reaching out over the clear water, and to the boat that I had fastened there.

The sunset was nigh at hand, and all the west was pink. The wind had died away, and the river lay like tinted glass between the dark borders of the forest. Above, the sky was blue, while in the south rose clouds that were like pillars, tall and golden. The air was soft as silk; there was no sound other than the ripple of the water about our keel and the low dash of the oars. The minister rowed, while I sat idle beside my love. He would have it so, and I made slight demur.

We left the bank behind us and glided into the midstream, for it was well to be out of arrowshot. The shadow of the forest was gone; still and bright around us lay the mighty river. When at length the boat's head turned to the west, we saw far up the stream the roofs of Jamestown, dark against the rosy sky.

"There is a ship going home," said the minister.

We to whom he spoke looked with him down the river, and saw a tall ship with her prow to the ocean. All her sails were set; the last rays of the sinking sun struck against her poop windows and made of them a half-moon of fire. She went slowly, for the wind was light, but she went surely, away from the new land back to the old, down the stately river to the bay and the wide ocean, and to the burial at sea of one upon her. With her pearly sails and the line of flame color beneath, she looked a dwindling cloud; a little while, and she would be claimed of the distance and the dusk.

"It is the George," I said.

The lady who sat beside me caught her breath. "Ay, sweetheart," I went on. "She carries one for whom she has waited. He has gone from out our life forever."

She uttered a low cry and turned to me, trembling, her lips parted, her eyes eloquent. "We will not speak of him," I said. "As if he were dead let his name rest between us. I have another thing to tell thee, dear heart, dear court lady masking as a waiting damsel, dear ward of the King whom His Majesty hath thundered against for so many weary months. Would it grieve thee to go home, after all?"

"Home?" she asked. "To Weyanoke? That would not grieve me."

"Not to Weyanoke, but to England," I said. "The George is gone, but three days since the Esperance came in. When she sails again I think that we must go."

She gazed at me with a whitening face. "And you?" she whispered. "How will you go? In chains?"

I took her clasped hands, parted them, and drew her arms around my neck. "Ay," I answered, "I will go in chains that I care not to have broken. My dear love, I think the summer lies fair before us. Listen while I tell thee of the news that the Esperance brought."

While I told of new orders from the Company to the Governor and of my letter from Buckingham, the minister rested upon his oars that he might hear the better. When I had ceased to speak he bent to them again, and his tireless strength sent us swiftly over the glassy water towards the town that was no longer distant. "I am more glad than I can tell you, Ralph and Jocelyn," he said, and the smile with which he spoke made his face beautiful.

The light streaming to us from the ruddy west laid roses in the cheeks of the sometime ward of the King, and the low wind lifted the dark hair from her forehead. Her head was on my breast, her hand in mine; we cared not to speak, we were so happy. On her finger was her wedding ring, the ring that was only a link torn from the gold chain Prince Maurice had given me. When she saw my eyes upon it, she raised her hand and kissed the rude circlet.

The hue of the sunset lingered in cloud and water, and in the pale heavens above the rose and purple shone the evening star. The cloudlike ship at which we had gazed was gone into the distance and the twilight; we saw her no more. Broad between its blackening shores stretched the James, mirroring the bloom in the west, the silver star, the lights between us and the Esperance, that lay between us and the town. Aboard her the mariners were singing, and their song of the sea floated over the water to us, sweetly and like a love song. We passed the ship unhailed, and glided on to the haven where we would be. The singing behind us died away, but the song in our hearts kept on. All things die not: while the soul lives, love lives: the song may be now gay, now plaintive, but it is deathless.

THE TRIAL OF AARON BURR

From 'Lewis Rand.' Copyright, Houghton, Mifflin Company, and used here by permission of the publishers and author.

The Capitol clock struck twelve. As the last stroke died upon the feverish air, the Chief Justice entered the hall and took the Speaker's chair. Beside him was Cyrus Griffin, the District Judge. Hay, the District Attorney, with his associates, William Wirt and Alexander McRae, now appeared, and immediately afterward the imposing array of the prisoner's counsel, a phalanx which included no less than four sometime attorneys-general and two subalterns of note. These took the seats reserved for them; the marshal and his deputies pressed the people back, and the jury entered and filled the jury box. Below and near them sat a medley of witnesses—important folk, and folk whom only this trial made important.

A loud murmur was now heard from without; the marshal's men, red and perspiring, cleared a thread-like path, and the prisoner, accompanied by his son-in-law, entered the hall. He was dressed in black, with carefully powdered hair. Quiet, cool, smiling and collected, he was brought to the bar, when, having taken his place, bowed to the judges and greeted his counsel, he turned slightly and surveyed with his composed face and his extremely keen black eyes the throng that with intentness looked on him in turn. It was by no means their first encounter of eyes. The preliminaries of that famous trial had been many and prolonged. From the prisoner's arrival in April under military escort to the present moment through the first arraignment at that bar, the assembling of the grand jury, the tedious waiting for Wilkinson's long-deferred arrival from New Orleans, the matter of the subpœna to the President with which the country rang, the adjournment from June to August, the victory gained by the defence in the exclusion of Wilkinson's evidence, and the clamor of the two camps into which the city was divided—through all this had been manifest the prisoner's deliberate purpose and attempt to make every fibre of a personality ingratiating beyond that of most, tell in its own behalf. He had able advocates, but none more able than Aaron Burr. His day and time was, on the whole, a time astonishingly fluid and naïve, and he impressed it.

There was in this moment, therefore, no novelty of encounter between him and the stare of the opposing throng. He was not seeing them, nor they him, for the first time. Yet the situation had its high intensity. This day was the beginning of the actual trial, and only the day which brought the verdict could outweigh it in importance. This was the lighting of the lamp that was to search out mysteries; this was the bending of the bow; this was the first rung of the ladder which might lead—where? As John Marshall's voice was heard from the bench and the prisoner turned from his steadfast contemplation of the throng, a psychic wave overflowed and lifted all the great assembly. This was spectacle, this was drama! The oldest of all the first principles stirred under the stimulus, and with savage naturalness sucked in the sense of pageant.

The court was opened. Counsel on both sides brought forward and disposed of a minor point or two, then, amid a silence so great that the twittering of the martins outside the windows seemed importunate and shrill, proclamation was made, the prisoner stood up, and the indictment was read.

"The grand inquest of the United States of America for the Virginia District upon their oath do present that Aaron Burr, late of the city of New York and State of New York, attorney-at-law, being an inhabitant of and residing within the United States, and under the protection of the laws of the United States, and owing allegiance and fidelity to the same United States, not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his said allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, wickedly devising and intending the peace and tranquillity of the said United States to disturb, and to stir, move and excite insurrection, rebellion and war against the said United States, on the tenth day of December, in the year of Christ one thousand, eight hundred and six, at a certain place called and known by the name of Blennerhassett's Island, in the county of Wood and District of Virginia aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, with force and arms, unlawfully, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did compass, imagine and intend to raise and levy war, insurrection and rebellion against the said United States."

And so on through much thunderous repetition to the final—

"And the said Aaron Burr with the said persons as aforesaid traitorously assembled and armed and arranged in manner aforesaid, most wickedly, maliciously and traitorously did ordain, prepare and levy war against the said United States, and further to fulfil and carry into effect the said traitorous compassings, imaginings and intentions of him, the said Aaron Burr, and to carry on the war thus levied as aforesaid against the United States, the said Aaron Burr with the multitude last mentioned, at the island aforesaid in the said county of Wood within the Virginia District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, did array themselves in a warlike manner, with guns and other weapons, offensive and defensive, and did proceed from the said island down the river Ohio in the county aforesaid, within the Virginia District, and within the jurisdiction of this court, on the said eleventh day of December, in the year one thousand, eight hundred and six aforesaid, with the wicked and traitorous intention to descend the said river and the river Mississippi, and by force and arms traitorously to take possession of the city commonly called New Orleans, in the territory of Orleans, belonging to the United States, contrary to the duty of their said allegiance and fidelity, against the Constitution, peace and dignity of the United States and against the form of the Act of Congress of the United States in such case made and provided."

The clerk ceased to read. When the last sonorous word had died upon the air the audience yet sat or stood in silence, bent a little forward, in the attitude of listeners. This lasted an appreciable moment, then the tension snapped. Marshall moved slightly in his great chair, Judge Griffin coughed, a rustling sound and a deep breath ran through the hall. The prisoner, who had faced with the most perfect composure the indictment's long thunder, now slightly inclined his head to the judges and took his seat. His counsel, ostentatiously easy and smiling, gathered about him, and the District Attorney rose to open for the Government in a lengthy and able speech.

In the gallery, among the fluttering fans, Jacqueline asked herself if her rising and quitting the place would disturb those about her. She was in the very front beside the gallery rail; there was a great crowd behind, she must stay it out. She bit her lip, forced back emotion, strove with resolution to conquer the too visionary aspect of all things before her. It had been foolish, she knew now, to come. She had not dreamed with what strong and feverish grasp such a scene could take prisoner the imagination. She saw too plainly much that was not there; she brought other figures into the hall; abstractions and realities, they thronged the place. place itself widened until to her inner sense it was as wide as her world and her life. Fontenov was there and the house on the Three-Notched Road; Roselands, and much besides. For all the heat and the fluttering of the fans, and the roll of declamation from the District Attorney, who was now upon the definition of treason, one night in February was there as well, the night that had seen so much imperiled, the night that had seen, thank God! the cloud go by. Of all the images that thronged upon her, creating a strange tumult of the soul, darkening her eyes and driving the faint colour from her cheek, the image of that evening was the most insistent. It was, perhaps, aided by her fancy that in that cool survey of the hall in which the prisoner indulged himself, his eyes keen and darting as a snake's, had rested for a moment upon her face. She could have said that there was in them a curious light of recognition, even a cool amusement, a sarcasm-the very memory of the look made for her a trouble vague but deep. Had he, too, given a thought to that evening, to the man whom he did not secure, and to the woman with whom he had talked of black lace and Spanish songs? She wondered. But why should Colonel Burr be amused, and why sarcastic? She abandoned the inquiry and listened to the heavy lumbering up of Government cannon. "Courts of Great Britain—Foster's Crown Laws—Demaree and Purchase—Vaughan—Lord George Gordon—Throgmorton—United States vs. Fries—Opinion of Judge Chase—of Judge Iredell—Overt Act—Overt Act proven—Arms, array and treasonable purpose; here is bellum levatum if not bellum percussum—Treason and traitors, not potential but actual—their discovery and their punishment—"

On boomed the guns of the prosecution. Jacqueline listened, fascinated for a time, but the words at last grew to hurt her so that, could she have done so unobserved, she would have stopped her ears with her hands. The feverish interest of the scene still held her in its grasp, but the words were cruel and struck upon her heart. She could not free herself from the brooding thought of how poignant, how burning, how deadly poisonous they had been to her, had all things been different and she forced to sit in this place hearing them launched against another than Aaron Burr, there, there at that bar! She unlocked her hands, drew a long and tremulous breath, and, leaning a little forward, tried not to listen and to lose herself in watching the throng below. Her eyes fell, at once, upon Ludwell Carv. He was standing where she had before marked him, beside a window almost opposite, his arm upon the sill, his attention closely given to the District Attorney, who was now eulogising that great patriot, General James Wilkinson. Now, while Jacqueline looked, he turned his head. It was as though she had called and he had been ready with his answer.

Painfully raised in feeling and driven out of habitual citadels, tense and fevered, subtly touched by the storm in the air, she found in the moment no sense of self-consciousness, no question and no movement of aversion. She and Cary looked at each other long and fully, and with something of an old understanding; on her part a softening of pardon for the quarrel and the duel, on his a light and compassion that she could not clearly understand. She knew that he read her thoughts, but if he, too, was remembering that evening long ago in February, he must also remember that Lewis Rand gave up, that snowy night, definitely and forever, the fevered ambitions, the toohigh imaginings, the conqueror's thirst for power; gave them up, and turned from the charmer into the path of right! There came into her heart a longing that Ludwell Cary should see the matter truly. He should have done so that afternoon in the cedar wood; where was the black mote that kept the vision out? She was suddenly aware—and it came to her with a dizzving strangeness-that there was in her own soul that reference of matters to the bar of Carv's idea, thought and judgment which that day in the cedar wood, she had told him existed in that of her husband. Were she and Lewis grown so much alike? or had her own soul always recognized, deferred to, rested upon, something in the inmost nature of the man into whose eyes she looked across this thronged and fevered space—something of rare equanimity, dispassionate yet tender. calm, high, impartial, and ideal? She did not know; she had not thought of it before. Her eyes dilated. Suddenly she saw the drawing-room at Fontenoy, green and gold and cool, with the portraits on the wall—Edmund Churchill, who fought with King Charles; Henry his son, who fled to Virginia and founded the family there; a second Edmund, aidede-camp to Marlborough; two Governors of Virginia and a President of the Council: the Lely and the Kneller-both Churchill women: and the fair face and form of Grandaunt Tacqueline, for whom she was named. She smelled the roses in the bowls and she saw herself singing at her harp. It was a night in June, the night of the great thunderstorm. Lewis Rand had come down from the blue room and Ludwell Cary entered from the darkness of the storm.

> Stone walls do not a prison make, Nor iron bars a cage; Minds innocent and quiet take That for a hermitage.

Unity's hand touched her. "Jacqueline, are you tired? Would you like to go away?"

The spell broke. Jacqueline was most tired, and she would very much have liked to go away, but a glance at her cousin and at the lady with whom they had come determined the question. That to both it was as good as a play, colour and animation proclaimed, and Jacqueline had not the heart to ring the curtain down. She shook her head and smiled. "We'll stay it out."

Her companion leaned back, relieved, and she was left to herself again. She knew that Cary's eyes were still upon her, but she would not turn her own that way. She made herself look at the judges upon the bench, the District Attorney, the opposing lawyers, even the prisoner. It was the heat and thunder in the air that made her so tense and yet so tremulous. Every nerve to-day was like a harp-string tightly drawn where every wandering air must touch it. All this would soon be over—then home and quiet! The day was growing old; even now Mr. Hay was addressing the jury with an impressiveness that announced the closing periods of a speech. When he was done, would not the court adjourn until tomorrow? It was said the trial might last two weeks. Mr. Hay sat down, but alas! before the applause and stir had ceased, Mr. Wickham was upon his feet.

Mr. Wirt followed Mr. Wickham and was followed in turn by Luther Martin. The firing was heavy. Boom, boom! went the guns of the Government, quick and withering came the fire from the defence. If advantage of position was with the first, the last showed the higher generalship. The duel was sharp, and it was followed by the spectators with strained interest. The Chief Justice on the bench and the prisoner at the bar, attentive though they both were, alone of almost all concerned seemed to watch the struggle calmly. drew toward late afternoon. Luther Martin, still upon the Overt Act, after an ironic compliment or two to the Government counsel and a statement that George Washington, the great and the good, might with a like innocency of intents have found himself in a like position with Colonel Burr, withdrew his guns for the night. The prosecution, after a glare of indignation, announced that on the morrow it would begin examination of witnesses; the Chief Justice said a few weighty words and the court was adjourned.

Out to the air, the grass and the trees, the gleam of the distant James, and a tremendous and fantastic show of clouds, piled along the horizon and flushed by the declining sun, streamed the crowd. Excited and voluble, lavish of opinions that had been pent up for hours and drinking in greedily the fresher air, it made no haste to quit the Capitol portico or the Capitol Square. There were friends and acquaintances to greet, noted people to speak to, or to hear and see others speak to, the lawyers to congratulate and the judges to bow to—and last but not least, there was the prisoner to mark enter, with the marshal, a plain coach and drive away to the house opposite the Swan, to which he had been removed from his rooms in the penitentiary.

RICHARD MALCOLM JOHNSTON

[1822-1898]

WALTER G. CHARLTON

R ICHARD MALCOLM JOHNSTON (lawyer, educator, writer), was born on his father's plantation, "Oak Grove," in Hancock County, Georgia, March 8, 1822, and died in Baltimore, Maryland. September 23, 1898. His great-grandfather, Rev. Thomas Johnston. had come to America from Dumfries, Annandale, Scotland, having, when a young man, been ordained by the Bishop of London, June 10, 1751, to serve in Maryland. After a few years spent in Pennsylvania and Maryland, this ancestor removed to Charlotte County. Virginia, and was resident rector of the parish of Cornwall, in Charlotte County, until his death. Among his children was William, whose son Malcolm became the father of Richard Malcolm. grandfather, having served in the Revolutionary forces, removed to Georgia in 1799, and settled in Hancock County. At his death the plantation fell to his son Malcolm, who became one of the most prosperous and respected men in that part of the State—clear-minded and forceful. Although in early youth much given to fox-hunting, dancing, and other light if pleasant pursuits, at thirty-five he became a Baptist minister of some eloquence and with the sufficiently rare gift of knowing when he was through with a sermon.

Richard Malcolm Johnston began his schooling at the age of five, in a small log house in an old field near the line of neighboring farms. This was the first of a series of "old field" schools encountered by him. The schoolmaster seems not to have been of a decided character, being giving to futile sketching rather than teaching. His successor is described in "How Mr. Bill Williams Took the Responsibility." And his successor seems to have been of the true "old field" type. "He kept school at a cross-roads near his father's residence, which was nearly two miles from our home," says Richard Malcolm. "He delighted in punishing. I think I must have gotten an average of at least one whipping a day, though I was less than seven years old. He was not as fierce as Israel Meadows, whom I have described in 'The Goosepond School,' yet I remember that he had the circus and the horses. In the latter I used to alternate in the riding and the carrying."

At ten he began upon the classics, and three years later came 2781

under the instruction of Salem Towne, of Massachusetts, whom the youth of past generations will recall as responsible for 'Towne's Analysis.' He emerged from these pedagogic surroundings with not only a proficiency in Latin and Greek but a definite taste for them which he never lost. At fifteen he was ready for the sophomore class at college; but, his physical development not having kept pace with that of his mind, his mother became apprehensive that he was not strong enough for the venture. With characteristic decision the father solved the problem. He kept the son at home, allotted him two days for hunting with gun and dogs, and for four days of the week kept him in the fields behind a plow. In two years he was six feet tall, with strength and health which did not fail him until literally the end. 'Don Quixote,' 'The Scottish Chief,' 'The Bandit's Bride, 'The Three Spaniards,' 'Thaddeus of Warsaw,' and 'Pilgrim's Progress' shared this period with the foxes and the plows. Writing of it, he says: "Though conscious of the best benefit that I was getting from this service, I tried but in vain to like it. Instead of this I hated it—all of it, the ploughing, hoeing, gathering corn and cotton. I always loved the country and the sight of country work, but never could overcome the irksomeness of doing any of it myself."

In 1839 he entered the sophomore class at Mercer University, being graduated in 1841, and immediately opening a school at Mount Zion, Hancock County. At the same time he began the reading of Blackstone's 'Commentaries.' The next year he entered the law offices of Henry Cumming, of the Augusta Bar; and, admitted to plead and practice in a few months, he returned to Hancock County and began his professional career.

In 1844 he married Mary Frances Mansfield, whose father, Ely Mansfield, was a native of Connecticut. He was then but twenty and his wife fifteen—a woman of much personal beauty and an accomplished musician (as he was himself), and finely educated. Their married life, extending beyond its golden anniversary, was to the last a loving union. For the two years preceding his marriage, his leisure had been devoted to English and Latin literature; and a short time after his law partner had been made judge, he ceased practice and accepted the principalship of the Academy of Mount Zion. The work there was successful; but after two years he resigned and went back to the law, entering into partnership, first with Judge James Thomas and then with Linton Stephens, a brother of Alexander H. Stephens and afterward Judge of the Supreme Court of Georgia. He was still in this last association when three positions were tendered him: the judgeship of the Northern Circuit, the presidency of Mercer University, and the professorship of belles-lettres at the University of Georgia. He accepted the last, retaining it for four years, beloved and valued by faculty and students. Returning to his plantation in Hancock County, he established his school for boys, which became famous in Georgia for its thoroughness and moral tone. The boys were upon their honor in regard to rules, and if there was any infraction concealed it was unknown to the student body. From this school went into the public life of Georgia many of the leaders of opinion whose lives illustrated the best traditions of the State. In 1867 he removed his school to Baltimore County, Maryland, whither Georgia boys continued to resort.

His literary ability had found expression during many years. He had published the first edition of his work on English literature before leaving Georgia, and the first of his stories, "The Goosepond School," had been published in Porter's Spirit of the Times. Others appeared in Field and Fireside, a periodical published in Augusta, Georgia. Subsequently they were republished in The Southern Magazine, and yet later they appeared in book form as 'The Dukesborough Tales,' over the nom de plume of "Philemon Perch." The success of this publication, and the prompt declaration of its literary merits by experienced critics, persuaded him to adopt a literary career. The best known of his stories are "The Goosepond School." "How Mr. Bill Williams Took the Responsibility," and "The Early Majority of Mr. Thomas Watts." Among later stories were "Mr. Neelus Peeler's Condition." "Puss Tanner's Defense." "A Critical Accident to Mr. Absalom Billingslea," "Mr. Cummin's Relinquishment," "Mr. Pate's Only Infirmity," "Ogeechee Cross-Firings," "Pearce Amerson's Will." A biography of Alexander H. Stephens and an enlarged edition of English literature were prepared in collaboration with William Hand Browne. 'Essays, Social and Literary' is one of the best of his works.

The great charm of the stories, upon which his reputation must rest, is in their delightful humor and faithfulness of description. The permissible exaggeration which here and there contributes to the humorous aspect is in the strict line of character-development—just such exaggeration as the average Georgian would consider necessary to interest the stranger in personal affairs. The ways and characters of these earlier times in middle Georgia, which he loved with singular devotion, have never had such sympathetic treatment by any other pen. All of the virtues of that wonderful people are insisted upon, and the spirit of fun which is never far from their elbows is constantly invoked. Apart from his literary instincts and training, no man was ever better equipped than he for the task of perpetuating in pleasant form the loving attributes of a people. Their best qualities found expression in his own life. Of a delightful personality, attractive in look and manner, with all the outward courtesy of the old school of Southern gentlemen, he had a courtesy of heart which made him at once the most considerate and charitable of men. He never harbored a mean thought nor tolerated a dishonorable action. His definition of a gentleman as he who gives least trouble to others was illustrated in his own life.

THE SCHOOLMASTER

From "The Goosepond School"; in 'Dukesborough Tales.' By permission of D. Appleton and Company.

It was the custom of the pupils in the Goosepond, as in most of the other country schools of those times, to study aloud. Whether the teachers thought that the mind could not act unless the tongue was going, or that the tongue going was the only evidence that the mind was acting, it never did appear. Such had been the custom, and Mr. Meadows did not aspire to be an innovator. It was his rule, however, that there should be perfect silence on his arrival, in order to give him an opportunity of saying or doing anything he might wish. This morning there did not seem to be anything heavy on his mind which required to be lifted off. He, however, looked at Brinkly Glisson with an expression of some disappointment. He had beaten him the morning before for not having gotten there in time, though the boy's excuse was that he had gone a mile out of his way on an errand for his mother. He looked at him as if he had expected to have had some business with him, which now unexpectedly had to be postponed. He then looked around over the school, and said: "Go to studyin'."

He had been in the habit of speaking but to command, and of commanding but to be obeyed. Instantaneously was heard, then and there, that unintelligible tumult, the almost invariable incident of the country schools of that generation. There were spellers and readers, geographers and arithmeticians, all engaged in their several pursuits, in the most inexplicable confusion. Sometimes the spellers would have the heels of the others, and sometimes the readers. The geographers were always third, and the arithmeticians always behind. It was very plain to be seen that these last never would catch the others. The faster they added or subtracted, the oftener they had to rub out and commence anew. It was always but a short time before they found this to be the case, and so they generally concluded to adopt the maxim of the philosopher, of being slow in making haste. The geographers were a little faster and a little louder. But the spellers and readers had it, I tell you. Each speller and each reader went through the whole gamut of sounds, from low up to high, and from high down to low again; sometimes by regular ascension and descension, one note at a time, sounding what musicians call the diatonic intervals; at other times, going up and coming down upon the perfect fifths only. It was refreshing to see the passionate eagerness which these urchins manifested for the acquisition of knowledge! To have heard them for the first time, one might possibly have been reminded of the Apostles' preaching at Pentecost, when were spoken the languages of the Parthians and Medes, Elamites and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea and Cappadocia; in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia; in Egypt and in the parts of Syria about Cyrene; and strangers of Rome, Jews and Proselytes, Cretes and Arabians. Sometimes these jarring tongues subsided a little, when half a dozen or so would stop to blow; but in the next moment the chorus would swell again in a new and livelier accrescendo. When this process had gone on for half an hour, Mr. Meadows lifted up his voice and shouted, "Silence!" and all was still.

Now were to commence the recitations, during which stillness like that of death was required. For as great a help to study as this jargon was, Mr. Meadows found that it did not contribute any aid to the doing of his work.

He now performed an interesting feat. He put his hand behind the lapel of his coat-collar, and then, after withdrawing it, and holding it up, his thumb and forefinger joined together, he said:

"There is too much fuss here. I'm going to drop this pin and I shall whip every single one of you little boys that don't hear it when it falls. That!"

"I heerd it, Mr. Meadows! I heerd it, Mr. Meadows!" exclaimed, simultaneously, five or six little fellows.

"Come up here, you little rascals. You are a liar!" said he to each one. "I never drapped it; I never had nary one to drap. It just shows what liars you are. Set down and wait awhile, I'll show you how to tell me lies."

The little liars slunk to their seats, and the recitations commenced. Memory was the only faculty of mind that got development at this school. Whoever could say exactly what the book said was adjudged to know his lesson. About half of the pupils on this morning were successful. The other half were found to be delinquent. Among these was Asa Boatright. That calculating young gentleman knew his words and felt safe. The class had spelled around three or four times when lo! the contingency which Allen Thigpen had suggested did come to pass. Betsy Wiggins missed her word; Heneritter Bangs (in the language of Allen) hern, and Mandy Grizzle hern; and thus responsibilities were suddenly cast upon Asa which he was wholly unprepared to meet, and which, from the look of mighty reproach that he gave each of these young ladies as she handed over her word, he evidently thought it the height of injustice that he should have been called upon to meet. Mr. Meadows, closing the book, tossed it to Asa, who, catching it as it was falling at his feet, turned, and his eyes swimming with tears, went back to his seat. As he passed Allen Thigpen, the latter whispered:

"What did I tell you? You heerd the pin drap too!"

Now, Allen was in no plight to have given this taunt to Asa. He had not given five minutes' study to his arithmetic during the whole morning. But Mr. Meadows made a rule (this one with himself, though all the pupils knew it better than any rule he had) never to allow Allen to miss a lesson; and as he had kindly taken this responsibility upon himself, Allen was wont to give himself no trouble about the matter.

Brinkly Glisson was the last to recite. Brinkly was no great hand at pronunciation. He had been reading but a short time when Mr. Meadows advanced him into geography, with the purpose, as Brinkly afterward came to believe, of getting the half-dollar extra tuition. This morning he thought he knew his lesson; and he did, as he understood it. When called to recite, he went up with a countenance expressive of mild happiness, handed the book to Mr. Meadows, and, putting his hands in his pockets, awaited the questions. And now it was an interesting sight to see Mr. Meadows smile as Brinkly talked of is-lands and promonitaries, thismuses and hemispheries. The lad misunderstood that smile, and his heart was glad for the unexpected reception of a little complacency from the master. But he was not long in error.

"Is-lands, eh? Thismuses, eh? Take this book and see if you can find any is-lands and promonitaries, and then bring them to me. I want to see them things, I do. Find 'em, if you please."

Brinkly took the book, and it would have melted the heart of any other man to see the deep despair of his heart as he looked on it and was spelling over to himself the words as he came to them.

"Mr. Meadows," he said, in pleading tones, "I thought it was is-land. Here it is, I-s-is-l-a-n-d-land: is-land;" and he looked into his face beseechingly.

"Is-land, eh? Is-land! Now, thismuses and promonitaries and hemispheries-"

"Mr. Meadows, I did not know how to pronounce them words. I asked you how to pronounce 'em and you wouldn't tell me; and I asked Allen, and he told me the way I said them."

"I believe that to be a lie." Brinkly's face reddened, and his breathing was fast and hard. He looked at the master as but once or twice before during the term, but made no answer. At that moment Allen leaned carelessly on his desk, his elbows resting on it, and his chin on his hands, and said dryly, "Yes, I did tell him so."

The man reddened a little. After a moment's pause, however, he said: "How often have I got to tell you not to ask anybody but me how to pronounce words? That'll do, sir; sit down, sir."

Brinkly went back to his seat, and, looking gloomily toward the door a minute or two, he opened his book, but studied it no more. . . . Mr. Meadows now set about what was the most agreeable portion of the duties of his new vocation, the punishment of offenders. The lawyers tell us that, of all the departments of the law, the vindicatory is the most important. This element of the Goosepond establishment had been cultivated so much that it had grown beyond all reasonable proportion to the others. As for the declaratory and the directory, they seemed to be considered, when clearly understood, as impediments to a fair showing and proper development of the vindicatory, insomuch that the last was often by their means disappointed of its victim. Sometimes, when his urchins would not "miss" or violate some of his numerous laws, Mr. Meadows used, in the plenitude of his power, to put the vindicatory first—punish an offender, declare what the latter had done to be an offense and then direct him that he had better not do so any more. Mr. Meadows, indeed, seemed to owe a grudge to society. Whether this was because society had not given him a father as it had done to almost everybody else, or because it had interfered in the peaceful occupation which had descended from his grandfather (as if to avenge itself on him for violating one of its express commands that such as he should inherit from nobody), did not appear. But he owed it, and he delighted in paying it off in his peculiar way; this was by beating the children of his school, every one of whom had a father. Eminently combative by nature, it was both safest and most satisfactory to wage his warfare on this general scale. So, on this fine morning, by way of taking up another instalment of this immense debt, which like most other debts seemed as if it never would get fully paid, he took down his bundle of rods from two pegs in one of the logs on which he had placed them, selected one fit for his purpose, and taking his position in the middle of the space between the fireplace and the rows of desks, he sat down in his chair. A moderate smile overspread his countenance as he said:

"Them spellin' classes and readin' classes, and them others that's got to be whipped, all but Sam Pate and Asa Boatright, come to the circus."

Five or six boys and as many girls, from eight to thirteen years old, came up, and sitting down on the front bench which extended all along the length of the two rows of desks pulled off their shoes and stockings. The boys then rolled up their pants, and the girls lifted the skirts of their frocks to their knees, and, having made a ring around the master as he sat in his chair, all began a brisk trot. They had described two or three revolutions, and he was straightening his switch, when Asa Boatright ran up, and, crying piteously, said:

"Please, sir, Mr. Meadows-oh pray do, sir, Mr. Meadows

—let me go into the circus!"

Mr. Meadows rose and was about to strike; but another thought seemed to occur to him. He looked at him amusedly for a moment, and pointed to his seat. As a took it. Mr. Meadows resumed his chair, and proceeded to tap the legs, both male and female, as they trotted around him. This was done at first very gently, and almost lovingly. But as the sport warmed in interest, the blows increased in rapidity and violence. The children began to cry out, and then he struck the harder; for it was a rule (oh! he was a mighty man for rules, this same Mr. Meadows) that whoever cried the loudest should be hit the hardest. He kept up this interesting exercise until he had given them about twenty-five lashes apiece. He then ceased. They stopped instantly, walked around him once, then, seating themselves upon the bench, they resumed their shoes and stockings, and went to their seats. One girl, thirteen years old, Henrietta Bangs, had begged him to let her keep on her stockings; but he was too firm a disciplinarian to allow it. When the circus was over she put on her shoes, and, taking up her stockings and putting them under her apron, she went to her seat and sobbed as if her heart were broken.

Allen Thigpen looked at her for a moment, and then he turned his eyes slowly around and looked at Brinkly Glisson. He sat with his hands in his pockets and his lips compressed. Allen knew what struggle was going on, but he could not tell how it would end. Mr. Meadows rested three minutes.

It has possibly occurred to those who may be reading this little history that it was a strange thing in Asa Boatright, who so well knew all the ways of Mr. Meadows, that he should have expressed so decisive a wish to take part in this last described exhibition—an exhibition which, however entertaining to Mr. Meadows as it doubtless was, and might be perchance to other persons placed in the attitude of spectators merely, could not be in the highest degree agreeable to one in the attitude which Master Asa must have foreseen that he would be made to assume had Mr. Meadows vouchsafed to yield to his request. But Asa Boatright was not a fool, nor was he a person who had no care for his physical well-being. In other words, Asa Boatright knew what he was about.

"Sam Pate and Asa Boatright!" exclaimed Mr. Meadows, after his rest. "Come out here and go to horsin'."

The two nags came out. Master Pate inclined himself forward, and Master Boatright leaped with some agility upon The former, gathering the latter's legs under his arms and drawing as tightly as possible his pants across his middle, began galloping gayly around the area before the fireplace. Mr. Meadows, after taking a fresh hickory, began to apply it with force and precision to that part of Master Boatright's little body which in his present attitude was most exposed. Every application of this kind caused that young gentleman to scream, and even to make spasmodic efforts to kick, which Master Pate, being for the occasion a horse, was to understand as an expression on his part of the rider that he should get on faster, and so Master Pate must frisk and prance and otherwise imitate a horse as well as possible in the circumstances. Now, the circumstances being that as soon as Master Boatright should have ridden long enough to become incapacitated from riding a real horse with comfort, they were to reverse positions, Master Boatright becoming horse and himself rider, they were hardly sufficient to make him entirely forget his identity in the personation of that quadruped. He did his best, though, in the circumstances, and not only frisked and pranced, but neighed several times. When Asa was placed in the condition hinted at above, he was allowed to dismount. Sam having mounted on his back, it was stirring to the feelings to see the latter kick and the former prance. This was always the best part of the show. A rule of this exercise was that, when the rider should dismount and become horse, he was to act well his part or be made to resume the part of rider—a prospect not at all agreeable, each one decidedly preferring to be horse. Sam was about three years older and fifteen pounds heavier than Asa. Now, while Asa had every motive which as sensible a horse as he was could have to do his best, yet he was so sore, and Sam, with the early prospect of butting his brains was so heavy, that he had great difficulties. He exhibited the most laudable desire and made the most faithful efforts to prance, but he could not keep his feet. Finding that he could do no great things at prancing, he endeavored to make up by neighing. When Sam would cry out and kick, Asa would neigh. He would occasionally run against the wall and neigh as if he were delighted. He would lift up one foot and neigh. He would put it down, lift up the other and neigh. Then when he attempted to lift up both feet at once, he would fall down and neigh. Again would he neigh even in the act of rising, apparently resolved to convince the world that, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, he was as plucky a little horse as had ever trotted. Never before had Asa acted his part so well in the horsin' at the Goosepond. Never had horse, with such odds on his back, neighed so lustily. Sam screamed and kicked. Asa pranced and neighed, until at last, as he stumbled violently against the bench, Sam let go his hold upon his neck, in order to avoid breaking his own, and fell sprawling on his belly under a desk. This sudden removal of the burden from Asa's back made his efforts to recover from his false step successful beyond all calculations, and he fell backward, head-foremost, upon the floor. Mr. Meadows, contrary to his wont, roared with laughter. He dropped his switch, and ordered them to their seats. They obeyed, and sat down with that graduated declension of body in which experience had taught them to be prudent.

* * * * * *

After the close of the last performance, Mr. Meadows seemed to need another resting spell. He always liked to be as fresh as possible for the next scene. The most interesting, the most exciting, and in some respects the most delightful exercise was yet to follow. This was the punishment of Brinkly Glisson.

Now, Brinkly was one of the best boys in the world. He was the only son of a poor widow, who at much sacrifice, had sent him to school. He had pitched and tended the crop of a few acres around the house, and she had procured the promise of a neighbor to help her in gathering it when ripe. Brinkly was the apple of her eye, the idol of her heart. He was to her as we always think of him of whom it was said, "He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow." And Brinkly had rewarded her love and care with all the feelings of his honest, affectionate heart. He was more anxious to learn for her sake than his own. He soon came to read tolerably well, and was advanced to geography. How proud was the widow when she bought the new geography and atlas with the proceeds of four pair of socks which she had knit with her own hands. What a world of knowledge, she thought, there must be in a book with five times as many pages as a spelling-book, and in those great red, blue, and pink pictures, covering a whole page a foot square, and all this knowledge to become the property of Brinkly! But Brinkly soon found that geography was above his present capacity, and so told Mr. Meadows. That gentleman received the communication with displeasure; said that what was the matter with him was laziness, and that laziness, of all the qualities which a boy had, was the one which he knew best what to do with. He then took to beating him. Brinkly, after the first beating, which was a light one, went home and told his mother of it, and intimated his intention not to take another. The widow was sorely distressed, and knew not what to do. On the one hand was her grief to know her son was unjustly beaten, and his spirit cowed; for she knew that he studied all the time he had, and, though uneducated herself, she was not like many other parents of her day who thought that the best means to develop the mind was to beat the body. But on the other hand would be his failing to obtain an education if he should leave the school, there being then no other in the neighborhood. This, thought the poor woman, was the worst thorn of the dilemma; and so she wept, and begged him, as he loved her, to submit. He should have the more time for study; she would chop the wood and feed the stock; he should have all the time at home to himself; he could get it, she knew he could; it would come to him after awhile.

Brinkly yielded; but how many a hard struggle he made to continue that submission no one knew but he. Mr. Meadows could see this struggle sometimes. He knew that the boy was not afraid of him. He saw it in his eye every time he beat him, and it was this which imparted such eagerness to continue. He wished to subdue him, and he had not succeeded. Brinkly would never beg nor weep. Mr. Meadows often thought he was on the point of resisting him; but he knew the reason why he did not, and, while he hated him for it, he trusted that it would last. Yet he often doubted whether it would or not; and thus the matter became so intensely exciting that he continually sought for opportunities of bringing it up. He loved to tempt him. He had no doubt but that he could easily manage him in an even combat; but he did not wish it to come to that. He only gloried in goading him almost to resistance, and then seeing him yield.

Have we not all seen how the showman adapts himself to the different animals of the menagerie? How quickly and sharply he speaks to the lesser animals, which jump over his wand and back, and over and back again, and then crouch in submission as he passes by! But when he goes to the lion, you can scarcely hear his low tones as he commands him to rise and perform his part, and is not certain whether the king of the beasts will do as he is bidden or not. Doubts like these were in the mind of Mr. Meadows whenever he was about to set upon Brinkly Glisson; but, the greater these doubts, the more he enjoyed the trial. After a short rest from the fatigues of the last exercise, during which he curiously and seriously eved the lad, he rose from his seat, paced slowly across the room once or twice, and taking a hickory switch, the longest of all he had, he stopped in the middle of the floor, and in a low, quiet tone, said:

"Brinkly Glisson, come."

Allen had been eyeing Brinkly all the time since the close of the circus. He noted the conflict which was going on in his soul, and he thought he saw that the conflict was going to end.

Slowly and calmly Brinkly rose from his seat, and walked up and stood before Mr. Meadows.

"Why, hi!" thought Allen.

"Off with your coat, sir"-low and gentle, and with a countenance almost smiling. Brinkly stood motionless. But he had done so once or twice before, in similar circumstances, and at length had yielded. "Off with it, sir"-louder and not so gentle. No motion on Brinkly's part, not even in his eyes, which looked steadily into the master's with a meaning which he nearly, but not quite, understood.

"Ain't you going to pull off that coat, sir?"

"What for?" asked Brinkly.

"What for, sir?"

"Yes, sir; what for?"

"Because I am going to give you this hickory, you impudent scoundrel; and if you don't pull it off this minute I'll give you sich a beatin' as'll make you feel like you never was whipped before since you was born. Ain't you going to pull it off, sir?"

"Not now, sir."

Allen wriggled on his seat, and his face shone as the full moon. Mr. Meadows retreated a step, and holding his switch two feet from the larger end, he raised that end to strike.

"Stop one minute, if you please."

Mr. Meadows lowered his arm, and his face smiled a triumph. This was the first time Brinkly had ever begged. He chuckled. Allen looked disappointed.

"Stop, eh? I yi! This end looks heavy, does it? Well, I wouldn't be surprised if it warn't sorter heavy. Will you pull off your coat now, sir?"

"Mr. Meadows, I asked you to stop because I wanted to say a few words to you. You have beat me and beat me, worse than you ought to beat a dog (Allen's face getting right again) and God in heaven knows that, in the time that I have come to school to you, I have tried as hard as a boy ever did to please you and get my lessons. I can't understand that jography, and I ain't been readin' long enough to understand it. I have asked you to let me quit. Mother has asked you. You wouldn't do it; but beat me, and beat me and beat me (there is no telling whether Allen wants to laugh or cry) and now, the more I study it, the more I don't understand it. I would have quit school long ago, but mother was so anxious for me to learn, and made me come. And now I have took off my coat to you the last time. (Ah! now there is a great tear in Allen's eye.) Listen to me (as the teacher's hand makes a slight motion); don't strike me. I know I'm not learnin' anything, and your beatin' ain't going to make me learn any faster. If you are determined to keep me in this jography, and to beat me, just say so, and I'll take my hat and books and go home. I'd like to not come to-day, but I thought I knew my lesson. Now, I say again, don't for God's sake, don't strike me." And he raised up both his hands, pale and trembling. It would be impossible to describe the surprise and rage expressed on the face of Mr. Meadows during the delivery and at the close of this little harangue. He looked at the boy a moment. Brinkly's countenance expressed the deepest sadness; but there was nothing in it like defiance or threatening. It was simply sad and beseeching. The master hesitated, and looked around upon his school. It would not do to retreat now, he thought. With an imprecation, he raised his switch and struck with all his might.

"My God!" cried the boy; but in an instant sadness and beseeching passed from his face. The long-pent-up resentment of his soul gushed forth, and the fury of a demon glared from his eyes. He was preparing to spring upon Mr. Meadows, when the latter, by a sudden rush, caught him and thrust him backward over the front bench. They both tumbled on the floor, between the rows of desks, Mr. Meadows uppermost.

"It's come," said Allen quietly, as he rose and looked down upon the combatants; "it's been a long time a-comin, and by rights ought to a come long ago; but it's come now."

Mr. Meadows attempted to disengage himself and rise;

but Brinkly would rise with him. After several attempts at this Brinkly managed to get upon one knee, and, by a violent jerk, to bring his assailant down upon the floor, where they were, in the phraseology of the wrestling-ring, cross and pile. Mr. Meadows shouted to two or three of the boys to hold Brinkly until he could rise. They rose to obey, but Allen, without saying a word, put out his hand before them, and, motioning them to their seats, they resumed them. And now the contest set in for good, Mr. Meadows struggling to recover his advantage, and Brinkly to improve what he had gained. The former's right arm was thrown across the latter's neck, his right hand wound in and pulling violently his hair, while his left hand pressed against his breast. Brinkly's left leg was across Mr. Meadows' middle, and with his right against a stationary desk, his right arm bent and lying under him like a lizard's, and his left in Mr. Meadows' shirt-collar, he struggled to get uppermost; but whenever he attempted to raise his head, that hand wound in his hair would instantly bring it back to the floor. When Mr. Meadows attempted to disengage himself from underneath Brinkly's leg that member, assisted by its brother from the desk, against which it was pressed, held it like the boa holds the bullock. Oh, Mr. Meadows, Mr. Meadows! you don't know the boy that grapples with you. You have never known anything at all about him. You blow, Mr. Meadows! See! Brinkly blows not half so hard. Remember, you walk a mile to and from the school, and Brinkly seven, often running the first half. Besides, there is something in Brinkly's soul which will not let him tire now. The remembrance of long-continued wrongs, that cannot longer be borne; the long-subdued but now inextinguishable desire of revenge; every hostile feeling except fear—all these are now dominant in that simple heart, and they have made of him a man, and if you hope to conquer you must fight as you never fought before, and never may have to fight again.

Your right hand pulls less vigorously at the hair of Brinkly's ascending head. Look there! Brinkly's leg has moved an inch further across you! Wring and twist, Mr. Meadows, for right under that leg, if anywhere for you, is now the post of honor. Can't you draw out your left leg and plant it against the desk behind you, as Brinkly does with his right? Alas! no. Brinkly has now made a hook of his left, and his heel is pressing close into the cavity behind your knee.

Ah! that was an unlucky move for you then, when you let Brinkly's hair go, and thrust both of your hands at his eyes. You must have done that in a passion. But see there, now! he has released his grasp at your shirt-collar, and thrown his left arm over you. Good-morning to you now, Mr. Meadows!

In the instant that Mr. Meadows had released his hold upon his hair, Brinkly, though he was being gouged terribly, released his hold upon his collar, threw his arm over his neck and pushing with all his might with his right leg against the desk, and making a corresponding pull with his left, he succeeded in getting fully upon him; then, springing up quick as lightning, as Mr. Meadows, panting, his eyes gleaming with the fury of an enraged tiger, was attempting to rise, he dealt him a blow in the face with his fist which sent him back bleeding like a butchered beast. Once more the Master attempted to rise, and those who saw it will never forget that piteous spectacle of rage, and shame, and pain, and fear. Once more Brinkly struck him back. How that boy's face shone out with those gaudia certaminis which the brave always feel when in the midst of an inevitable and righteous combat! Springing upon his adversary again, and seizing his arms and pinioning them under his knees, he wound his hands in his shaggy hair, and raising his head, thrust it down several times with all his might against the floor.

"Spare me! for God's sake, spare me!" cried Mr. Meadows, in tones never before heard from him in that house.

Brinkly stopped. "Spare you!" he said, now panting himself. "Yes! you who never spared anything that you could hurt! Poor coward! You loved to beat other people, and gloried in seeing them suffering, and when they begged you to spare them you laughed—you did. Oh, how I have heard you laugh, when they asked you to spare them! And now, beat yourself and whipped, you beg like a dog. Yes, and I will spare you," he continued, rising from him. "It would be a pity to beat any such a poor cowardly human any longer. Now, go! and make them poor things go to horsin' again, and cut 'em in two again! and then get in the circus ring, and make them others, girls and all—yes, girls and all—hold up their clothes and trot around you, and when they cry like you, and beg you to spare 'em, do you laugh again!"

He rose and turned away from him. Gathering up his books, he went to the peg whereon his hat was hanging, and was in the act of taking it down, when a sudden revulsion of feeling came over him, and he sat down and wept and wept.

THE EARLY MAJORITY OF MR. THOMAS WATTS

From 'Dukesborough Tales.'

"O, 'tis a parlous boy."-Richard III.

LITTLE Tom Watts, as he used to be called before the unexpected developments which I propose briefly to narrate, was the second in a family of eight children, his sister Susan being the eldest. His parents dwelt in a small house situate on the edge of Dukesborough. Mr. Simon Watts, though of extremely limited means, had some ambition. He held the office of constable in that militia district, and in seasons favorable to law business, made about fifty dollars a year. The outside world seemed to think it was a pity that the head of a family so large and continually increasing should so persistently prefer mere fame to the competency which would have followed upon his staying at home and working his little field of very good ground. But he used to contend that a man could not be expected to live always, and therefore he ought to try to live in such a way as to leave to his family, if nothing else, a name that they wouldn't be ashamed ever to hear mentioned after he was gone.

Yet Mr. Watts was not a cheerful man. Proud as he might justly feel in his official position, it went hard with him to be compelled to live in a way more and more pinched as his family continued to multiply with astonishing rapidity. His spirits, naturally saturnine, grew worse and worse with every fresh arrival in the person of a baby, until the eighth. Being yet a young man, comparatively speaking, and being used to make calculations, the figures seemed too large as he looked to the future. I would not go so far as to say that this prospect actually killed him; but at any rate he took a sickness which the doctor could not manage, and then Mr. Watts gave up his office and everything else that he had in this world.

But Mrs. Watts, his widow, had as good a resolution as any other woman in her circumstances ever had. She had no notion of giving up in that way. She gave up her husband, it is true; but that could not be helped: and without making much ado about even that, she kept going at all sorts of work, and somehow she got along at least as well after as before the death of Mr. Simon.

A person not well acquainted with the brood of little Wattses often found difficulty in discriminating among them. I used to observe them with considerable interest as I went into Dukesborough occasionally with one, or the other, or both of my parents. They all had white hair, and red chubby faces. It was long a matter of doubt what was their sex. Such was the rapidity of their succession, and so graduated the declivity from Susan downwards, that the mother used to cut all their garments after a fashion that was very general in order that they might descend during the process of decay to as many of them as possible. Now, although I saw them right often, I had believed for several months, for instance, that little Jack was a girl, from a yellow frock that had belonged to his sister Mary Jane, but which little Jack wore until his legs became subjected to such exposure that it had to descend to Polly Ann, his next younger sister. Then I made a similar mistake about Polly Ann; who, during this time, had worn little Jack's breeches, out of which he had gone into Mary Jane's frock; and I thought on my soul that Polly Ann was a boy.

In regard to little Tommy, not only I, but the whole public had been in a state of uncertainty in this behalf for a great length of time. Having no older brother, and Susan's outgrown dresses being alone available, his male wardrobe was inevitably only half as extensive and various as by good rights, generally speaking, it ought to have been. Therefore little Tommy had to make his appearance alternately in frock and breeches, according to the varying conditions of these garments, for a period that annoyed him the more the longer it extended, and finally began to disgust. Tom eagerly wished that he could outgrow Susan, and thus get into breeches out and out. But Susan, in this respect, as indeed in almost all others, kept her distance in the lead.

There was a difference, easily noticeable, in Tom's deportment in these seasons. While in frocks it was subdued, retiring, and if not melancholy, at least fretful. Curiosity, perhaps, or some other motive equally powerful, might, and indeed sometimes did, lead him outside of the gate; but never to linger there for any great length of time. If he had to go upon an errand during that season (a necessity which that resolute woman, his mother, enforced without the slightest hesitation), he went and returned with speed. Yet, before starting out on such occasions, he was wont to be careful to give his hair such a turn that his manly head might refute the lie which Susan's frock had told. For it is probable that there have been few, if indeed any boys who were more unwilling either to be, or to be considered of the opposite sex than that same Tom Watts. I do not remember ever to have seen a boy whose hair had so high and peculiar a roach as his exhibited, especially when he wore his sister Susan's frocks. Instead of being parted in the middle, it was divided into three parts. It was combed perfectly straight down on the sides of his head, and perfectly straight up from the top. An immense distance was thus established between the extremities of any two hairs which receded contiguously to each other on the border lines.

All this was an artful attempt to divert public attention from the frock which intimated the female, to the head which asserted and which was supposed to establish the male. He once said to Susan:

"When they sees your old frock, they makes out like that they 'spicions me a gal; but when they looks at my har all roached up, then they knows who I air."

"Yes indeed," answered Susan, "and a sight you air. Goodness knows, I'd rather be a girl, and rather look like one if I weren't, than to look like you do in that fix."

But it was during the other season, that which he called his breeches week, that Tommy Watts was most himself. In this period he was cheerful, bold, and notorious. He was as often upon the street as he could find opportunities to steal away from home; and while there, he was as evidently a boy as was to be found in Dukesborough or any other place of its size. In this happy season he seemed to be disposed to make up as far as possible for the confinements and the gloominesses of the other. So much so, indeed, that he had to be whipped time and time again for his unlicensed wanderings and for many other pranks which are indeed peculiar to persons of his age and sex, but which he seemed to have the greater temptation to do, and which he did with more zest and temerity than other boys, because he had only half their time in which to do them. Tom Watts maintained that if a boy was a boy, then he ought to be a boy; and as for himself, if he had to be a girl a part of the time, he meant to double on them for the balance. By them he meant his Mammy, as he was wont to call his surviving parent. But she understood the method of doubling as well as he; for while she whipped him with that amount of good-will which in her judgment was proper, she not unfrequently cut short his gay career by reducing him to Susan's frock, or (if it was not ready for the occasion) to his own single shirt. On such occasions he would relapse at once into the old melancholy ways. If Thomas Watts had been familiar with classical history, I have not a doubt that. in these periods of his humiliation, he would have compared his case with that of the great Achilles, whose mother had him kept in inglorious seclusion amid the daughters of Lycomedes. Yet, like that hero further in being extremely imprudent, no sooner would he recover his male attire than he would seem to think that no laws had ever been made for him. and would rush headlong into difficulties and meet their 'consequences. Tom, as his mother used to say, was a boy of a "tremenjuous sperrit." But it had come from her, and enough had been left in her for all domestic purposes. In every handto-hand engagement between the two, Thomas was forced to yield and make terms; but he resolved over and over, and communicated that resolution to many persons, that if he ever did obtain his liberty, the world should hear from him. His late father having been to a degree connected, as we remember, with the legal profession, Tom had learned one item (and that was probably the only one that he did learn sufficiently well to remember) of the law: that was, that young men of fourteen who had lost their fathers might go into court and choose their own guardians, and do other things besides. How he did long for that fourteenth birthday! The more he longed for it the longer it seemed in coming. He had gotten to believe that if it ever should come, he would have lived long enough and had experience enough for all, even the most difficult and responsible purposes of human

But events that must come will come, if we will only wait for them. In process of time, which to the hasty nature of Tom seemed unreasonably and cruelly long in passing, he seemed to emerge from the frock for good and all. The latest inducement to a preparation for this liberty was a promise that it should come the sooner provided he would improve in the care that he was wont to take of his clothes, for he had been a sad fellow in that item of personal economy. When this inducement was placed before him, he entered upon a new career. He abjured wrestlings with other boys, and all other sports and exercises, however manly, which involved either the tearing of his attire or contact with the ground. He even began to be spruce and dandvish, and the public was astonished to find that in the matter of personal neatness Tom Watts was likely to become a pattern to all the youth of Dukesborough and its environs. His roach grew both in height and in sleekness; and when his hat was off his head, Tom Watts was the tallest-looking boy of his inches that I ever saw.

Resolute as was the Widow Watts, she had respect for her word, and was not deficient in love for her offspring. Besides, it was getting to be high time for Tom to go to school. if he ever was to go. Now, in a school, I maintain, if nowhere else, it is undeniably to be desired that everybody's sex should be put beyond doubt. Even a real girl in a school of boys, or a real boy in a school of girls, it is probable would both feel and impart considerable embarrassment. This would doubtless be much increased in case where such a matter was in doubt. There is no telling what a difference an uncertainty in this behalf would make, not only in the hours of study, but even to a perhaps greater extent in those of play. I have lived in the world long enough to feel justified in saying that suspicions and doubts are more efficacious than facts in producing embarrassments and alienations. Oh! it is no use to say anything more upon the subject. Mrs. Watts had sense enough to have respect for public sentiment; and when Tom was ready for school, Susan's frock had to be laid aside. However, Mary Jane, who was a fast grower, went into it, with the taking of only a little tuck, and nothing was wasted.

Tom Watts, therefore, avowedly and notoriously, for good and for all and forever, became a boy. When he stepped out of Susan's frock for the last time, and stepped into a new pair of trowsers which had been made for the purpose of honoring the occasion, he felt himself to be older by many years; and if not as sleek, was at least as proud as any snake when, with the incoming Spring, he has left his old skin behind him and glided into the sunlight with a new one.

The neat habits which he had adopted from policy, he continued to practice, to his mother's great delight. It was really a fine thing to observe the care he took with his clothes; and the manly gait he assumed would have led unthinking persons almost to conclude that the having been confounded so long with the other sex had begotten a repugnance for the latter which might never be removed. Such was the rapidity of his strides towards manhood, that some females of his acquaintance not unfrequently spoke of him as Mr. Thomas Watts, while others went further, left off the Thomas altogether and called him Mr. Watts.

But time, which is ever making revelations that surprise mankind, was not slow to reveal that Mr. Watts had not yet been fully understood. He had been going to school to Mr. Cordy for several weeks in the winter, and was believed to be making reasonable progress. He had now passed his thirteenth year, and had gone some distance upon his fourteenth. He had long looked to that day as the commencement of his majority. A guardian (or as he was wont to say, a gardzeen) was an incumbrance which he had long determined to dispense with. This was not so much, however, because there would be not a thing for such an official to manage except the person of Mr. Thomas himself, as that he had no doubt, not a shadow of a doubt in fact, that such management would be more agreeable, more safe, and in every way better in his own hands than in those of any other person of his acquaintance.

Mr. Cordy's school was in a grove of hickory and oak at the end of the village opposite to the one at which Mrs. Watts's cabin stood. At the hither end of this grove was another small school of girls, kept by Miss Julia Louisa Wilkins.

She was from Vermont, and was a young lady of about twenty-eight years, very fair, somewhat tall, and upon the whole a rather good, certainly a cheerful-looking face. For I should remark that Dukesborough, which ever held Augusta in view, had in the pride of its ambition abolished the system of mixed schools, and though the number of children was rather limited to allow of great division, still Dukesborough would have, and did have, two institutions of learning. Miss Wilkins had under her charge about fifteen girls, ranging from eight years old to fourteen. Prominent among them were Miss Adeline Jones, Miss Emily Sharp, Miss Lorinda Holland, Miss Jane Hutchins, and Mr. Watts's elder sister, Susan.

Mr. Watts's relations to this Institution (for it was thus that the mistress insisted that her establishment should be styled) seemed to have been started by accident. One morning, as with lingering but not unmanly steps he was passing by on his way to his own school, he spied Miss Wilkins through the window in the act of kindling a fire. As her face was turned from him he had the opportunity, and he used it, to observe her motions for several moments.

Whether because the kindling wood was damp, or Miss Wilkins was not expert, I would not undertake at this late day to say. But the fire would not make a start; and the lady, apparently bent upon getting warm in some way, threw down the tongs, gave the logs a kick, and abruptly turned her back upon the fire-place. Observing Mr. Watts at that instant, and possibly suspecting that he was a person of an accommodating disposition, she requested his assistance. He yielded promptly, and it did Miss Wilkins good to see how quickly the blaze arose and the genial warmth radiated through the room. The artificial heat at once subsided, and she smiled and thanked him in a way that could not soon be forgotten. Then she inquired his name, and was surprised and gratified to know that so manly a person as he was should be the brother of one of the best and most biddable girls in her school.

This accident, trifling in appearance, led to consequences. Mr. Watts had frequent opportunities of rendering this same service, and others of an equally obliging nature. These gave him access to the Institution in its hours of ease; and the care that he took of his clothes, and the general manners that he adopted, were reaching to a height that approached perfection. If the roach on the summit of his head was not quite as high as formerly (a depression caused by his having now a hat to wear), it was not any less decided and defiant.

Yet he never seemed disposed to abuse his privileges at the Institution of Miss Wilkins. Although he was there very often, he usually had little to say to any of the young ladies, and seemed to try to have the utmost respect for all the mistress's rules and regulations in regard to the intercourse of her pupils with the opposite sex. It must be admitted that Mr. Watts had not advanced lately in his studies to the degree that was promised by his opening career. But Mr. Cordy was a reasonable man, and, upon principle, was opposed to pushing boys along too fast. Mrs. Watts, although not a person of education herself, yet suspected from several circumstances that her son was not well improving the little time which she could afford to send him to school. But his deportment was such an example to the younger children that she had not the heart to complain, except in a very general way.

Of all persons of Mr. Watts's acquaintance, his sister Susan was the only one who seemed to fail to appreciate his manly habits. She used to frown dreadfully upon him, even when he seemed to be at his very best. Sometimes she even broke into immoderate laughter. While the former conduct had no influence, the latter used to affect him deeply. He would grow very angry, and abuse her, and then become even more manlike. But when Susan would think that he was carrying matters into extremes, she would check him somewhat in this wise:

"Now lookee here, Tom; if you talk to me that way, I shall tell Ma what's the matter with you; and if you don't quit being such a man, and stop some of your foolishness, I'll tell her anyhow."

Threats of this sort for a time would recall Mr. Watts at least to a more respectful treatment of his sister. Indeed, he condescended to beg her not to mention her suspicions, although he assured her that in these she was wholly mistaken. But Susan did know very well what he was about, and it is probable that it is high time I should explain all this uncommon conduct. The truth is, Susan had ascertained that so far from having the repugnance to ladies that had been feared at first might grow out of his remembrance of the long confusion of the public mind touching his own sex, Mr. Thomas Watts had already conceived a passion that was ardent and pointed, and ambitious to a degree which Susan characterized as "perfectly redickerlous."

But who was the young lady who had thus concentrated upon herself all the first worship of that young but manly heart? Was it Miss Jones, or Miss Sharp? Was it Miss Holland, or Miss Hutchins? Not one of these. Mr. Thomas Watts had with one tremendous bound leaped clear over the heads of these secondary characters, and cast himself at the very foot of the throne. To be plain, Mr. Watts fondly, entirely, madly loved Miss Julia Louisa Wilkins, the mistress and head of the Dukesborough Female Institution.

Probably this surprising reach might be attributed to the ambitious nature of his father, from whom he had inherited this and some other qualities. Doubtless, however, the recollection of having been kept long in frocks had engendered a desire to convince the world that they had sadly mistaken their man. Whatever was the motive power, such was the fact. Now, notwithstanding this state of his own feelings, he had never made a declaration in so many words to Miss Wilkins. But he did not doubt for a moment that she thoroughly understood his looks, and sighs, and devoted services. For the habit which all of us have of enveloping beloved objects in our hearts, and making them, so to speak, understand and reciprocate our feelings, had come to Mr. Watts even to a greater degree perhaps than if he had been older. He was as little inclined and as little able to doubt Miss Wilkins as to doubt himself. Facts seemed to bear him out. She had not only smiled upon him time and time again, and patted him sweetly on the back of his head, and praised his roach to the very skies; but once, when he had carried her a great armful of good, fat pine-knots, she was so overcome as to place her hand under his chin, look him fully in the face, and declare if he wasn't a man, there wasn't one in this wide, wide world.

Such was the course of his true love when its smoothness suffered that interruption which so strangely obtrudes itself among the fondest affairs of the heart. Miss Susan had threatened so often with no fulfilment to give information to their mother, that he had begun to presume there was little or no danger from that quarter. Besides Mr. Watts had now grown so old and manlike that he was getting to be without apprehension from any quarter. He reflected that within a few weeks more he would be fourteen years old, when legal rights would accrue. Determining not to choose any "gardzeen," it would follow that he must become his own. Yet he did not intend to act with unnecessary notoriety. His plans were, to consummate his union on the very day he should be fourteen; but to do so clandestinely, and then run away, not stopping until he should get with his bride plump into Vermont. For even the bravest find it necessary sometimes to retreat.

Of the practicability of this plan he had no doubt, because he knew that Miss Wilkins had five hundred dollars in hard cash—a whole stocking full. This sum seemed to him immensely adequate for their support in becoming style for an indefinitely long period of time.

As the day of his majority approached, he grew more and more reserved in his intercourse with his family. This was scarcely to be avoided now when he was already beginning to consider himself as not one of them. If his conscience ever upbraided him as he looked upon his toiling mother and his helpless brothers and sisters, and knew that he alone was to rise into luxury while they were to be left in their lowly estate, he reflected that it was a selfish world at best, and that every man must take care of himself. But one day, after a season of unusual reserve, and when he had behaved to Miss Susan in a way which she considered outrageously supercilious, the latter availed herself of his going into the village, fulfilled her threat, and gave her mother full information of the state of his feelings.

That resolute woman was in the act of ironing a new homespun frock she had just made for Susan. She laid down her iron, sat down in a chair, and looked up at Susan.

"Susan, don't be foolin' 'long o' me."

"Ma, I tell you it's the truth."

"Susan, do you want me to believe that Tom's a fool? I know'd the child didn't have no great deal of sense; but I didn't think he was a clean-gone fool."

But Susan told many things which established the fact beyond dispute. In Mr. Thomas's box were found several evidences of guilt. There was a great red picture of a young woman, on the margin of which was written the name of Miss Julia Louisa Wilkins. Then there was wrapped carefully in a rag a small piece of sweet soap, which was known by Susan to have been once the property of Miss Wilkins. Then there were sundry scraps of poetry, which were quite variant in sentiment, and for this and other reasons apparently not fully suited for the purposes for which they were employed. Mr. Watts's acquaintance with amatory verses being limited, he had recourse to his mother's hymn-book. Miss Wilkins was assured how tedious and tasteless were the hours. Her attention was directed alternately to Greenland's icy mountains and India's coral strand. She was informed that here he was raising his Ebenezer, having hitherto thus safely come. But immediately afterwards his mind seemed to have changed, and he remarked that his home was over Jordan, and suggested that if she should get there before he did, she might tell them he was a-coming. Then he urged Miss Wilkins to turn, sinner, turn, and with great anxiety inquired why would she die? These might have passed for evidences of a religious state of mind but that they were all signed by Miss Wilkins's loving admirer, Thomas Watts. Indeed, in the blindness of his temerity, he had actually written out his formal proposition to Miss Wilkins, which he had intended to deliver to her on the very next day. This had been delayed only because he was not quite satisfied either with the phraseology or the handwriting. As to the way in which it would be received, his ardent soul had never entertained a doubt.

"Well, well!" exclaimed his mother, after getting through with all this irrefragable evidence. "Well, well! I never should a-blieved it. But I suppose we live and larn. Stealing out of my hime-book too. It's enough to make anybody sick at the stomach. I know'd the child didn't have much sense; but I didn't know he was a clean-gone fool. Yes, we lives and larns. But bless me, it won't do to tarry here. Susan, have that frock ironed all right, stiff and starch, by the time I git back. I shan't be gone long."

The lady arose, and without putting on her bonnet, walked rapidly down the street.

"What are you lookin' for, Mrs. Watts?" inquired an acquaintance whom she met on her way.

"I'm a-looking for a person of the name of Mr. Watts," she answered, and rushed madly on. The acquaintance hurried home, but told other acquaintances on the way that the Widow Watts have lost her mind and gone ravin' distracted. Soon afterwards, as Mr. Watts was slowly returning, his mind full of great thoughts and his head somewhat bowed, he suddenly became conscious that his hat was removed and his roach rudely seized. Immediately afterwards he found himself carried along the street, his head foremost and his legs and feet performing the smallest possible part in the act of locomotion. The villagers looked on with wonder. The conclusion was universal. Yes, the Widow Watts have lost her mind.

When she had reached her cabin with her charge, a space was cleared in the middle by removing the stools and the children. Then Mr. Watts was ordered to remove such portions of his attire as might oppose any hindrance whatever to the application of a leather strap to those parts of his person which his mother might select.

"Oh, mother, mother!" began Mr. Watts.

"No motherin' o' me, Sir. Down with 'em," and down they came, and down came the strap rapidly, violently.

"Oh, Mammy, Mammy!"

"Ah, now! that sounds a little like old times; when you used to be a boy," she exclaimed in glee as the sounds were repeated amid the unslackened descent of the strap. Mrs. Watts seemed disposed to carry on a lively conversation during this flagellation. She joked her son pleasantly about Miss Wilkins, inquired when it was to be and who was to be invited? Oh, no! she forgot; it was not to be a big wedding, but a private one. But how long were they going to be gone before they would make a visit? But Mr. Watts not only could not see the joke, but was not able to join in the conversation at all, except to continue to scream louder and louder, "Oh Mammy, Mammy!" Mrs. Watts, finding him not disposed to be talkative, except in mere ejaculatory remarks, appealed to little Jack, and Mary Jane, and Polly Ann, and to all, down even to the baby. She asked them, Did they know that Buddy Tommy were a man grown, and were going to git married and have a wife, and then go away off yonder to the Vermontes? Little Jack, and Polly Ann, and the baby, and all evidently did not precisely understand; for they all cried and laughed tumultuously.

How long this exercise, varied as it was by most animated conversation, might have continued if the mother had not become exhausted, there is no calculating. Things were fast approaching that condition when the son declared that his mother would kill him if she didn't stop.

"That," she answered between breaths, "is—what—I—aims—to do—if—I can't git it—all—all—every—spang—passel—outen you."

Tom declared that it was all gone.

"Is you—a man—or—is you—a boy?"

"Boy! boy! Mammy," cried Tom. "Let me up, Mammy—and—I'll be a boy—as long—as I live."

She let him up.

"Susan, whar's that frock? Ah, there it is. Lookee here. Here's your clo'es, my man. Mary Jane, put away them pantaloonses."

Tom was making ready to resume the frock. But Susan remonstrated. It wouldn't look right now, and she would go Tom's security that he wouldn't be a man any more.

He was cured. From being an ardent lover, he grew to become a hearty hater of the principal of the Dukesborough Female Institution, the more implacable upon his hearing that she had laughed immoderately at his whipping. Before many months she removed from the village, and when two years afterwards a rumor (whether true or not we never knew) came that she was dead, Tom was accused of being gratified by the news. Nor did he deny it.

"Well, fellers," said he, "I know it weren't right; but I couldn't keep from being glad ef it had akilt me."
